However, representations to Ministers are more effective if they are assisted by professional advice from those specialising in immigration affairs, in law centres. In my weekly advice work, I can easily have between 25 and 35 separate cases to deal with in one evening, which may involve 45 or 50 people being in my surgery. Without being a permanent advice worker ones self, there is no way in which one can do adequate credit to the needs and the demands of those who are bringing the case on education, housing or immigration, unless one has the assistance that is made possible not just by the citizens advice bureaux but by the law centres.

Immigration is especially important, given that the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants does the best that it can, but the United Kingdom Immigration Advisory Service, which also does its best, is not an independent body and does not have the relative autonomy in these cases that the law centres have. The means of redress for such grievances, are essential. Mundane though they might be in the cases of education or housing, such cases are more serious and dramatic in immigration.

When it comes to policing, the matter is all important, as are the complaints about policing made by my constituents in the Lambeth and Brixton areas. On previous occasions, I have paid credit to the enlightened policing at the commander level in my borough, and I have in mind especially the extent to which a fragile peace was kept on the streets between 1981-85. This in large part was due to the enlightened policing and openness of approach of the former police commander, Alex Marnoch. However, I cannot certainly say the same below senior level in the borough of Lambeth. On the street at the ordinary young police constable level there are forms of behaviour which, while in some cases no doubt impeccable and excellent, in other cases are clearly provocative and disturbing to my constituents.

I have it in mind, for example, to cite not just the direct experience of my constituents or my own indirect evaluation of the problem but the kind of report which was made by The Economist following the events which took place at the end of September last year where the journalist concerned directly reported racist behaviour by police, assault by police on individuals who, in the judgment of the journalist, had committed no offence and then, in the police station itself, offensive behaviour again used by police even in the charge room.

If these cases cannot be adequately remedied, they lead to a build-up of pressure and social discontent. Again, I am not saying that in each individual case the integrity of police officers should be impugned. The problem is that, when the standards which we should expect of policing fall, when it is not simply the perception of individuals that they are being discriminated against but in particular of black people in my constituency that they may be discriminated against, then the problem potentially gives rise to considerable social discontent. The difference is then expressed when the threshold is lowered and when disorders occur, as they occurred in 1981 and again following the shooting of Mrs. Cherry Groce in my constituency of Vauxhall, Lambeth.

If one is young, whether one is black or white, and one has been picked up without due cause and put in the back of a van and kneed in the groin or maltreated on that occasion, the next time one sees a police officer on the ground with other people around, one will not be likely to move towards the scene to assist the officer to recover. Unfortunately, it is more likely that worse consequences may follow for the police themselves.

It is in these kind of cases following events in September of last year that the role played by the Brixton law centre was extremely important in enabling people who felt that they had grievances following the disorders — whether they were grievances with regard to the police or other grievances with regard to individuals—to come forward and state their case, and for an evaluation to be made of the evidence in the cases arising from those disorders.

As the Member of Parliament for a constituency called Vauxhall but which, indeed, includes a large part of central Brixton, I found it extremely useful that the law centre, in a very sober and serious-minded way, convened meetings of private solicitors, and other interested parties and was able to take an overview of cases. For instance, following those disorders, people who on some occasions had been picked up off the street in snatch and grab seizures were being taken to police stations with no adequate information being given. Tnen they appeared in court. Nobody knew in which court they would appear and nobody was necessarily in a position to represent them. I put it to senior police in Lambeth at the time that this was a potentially dangerout situation—I stress dangerous—inasmuch as if innocent people were being charged but were not adequately represented in the courts this gave rise to secondary grievance which itself, if a further incident occurred that was comparable to that of the shooting of Mrs. Cherry Groce, could trigger a further chain of events.

Again I pay credit to the senior police, because they grasped that and they were willing to co-operate with the law centre as a reputable, estabished body that could adequately represent the interests of those being charged. The system did not work perfectly by any means. But in principle it meant that the police were co-operating by indicating to the law centre, and to the duty service that was staffed by the law centre, who had been charged, in which court they would appear, and at what time, and also be seeking to ensure that they were represented.

I do not want to suggest that disorder or disturbances in inner cities are provoked simply by policing, although in the case of Mrs. Cherry Groce—and in 1981—the underlying cause was policing. As soon as a disorder has started it is clear that serious offences are committed by individuals against other members of the public and that the due process of the law should obtain, that charges should be brought and that sentences should be passed. However, the cases that I have just cited include many that do not come within that category. Failure to provide due process and means of legal redress for those who cannot afford access to private solicitors becomes a matter of importance to inner city peace.

The Government appear several times over to have changed their policy on the funding of law centres. In a letter to Lord Elwyn-Jones dated 19 November 1984 the Lord Chancellor said:

"The Government acknowledge the part to be played by law centres in the provision of legal services where this suits local circumstances. I appreciate that law centres are now seen as playing an important part in the provision of advisory services."

There was also a letter from the Lord Chancellor's Department to Simon Hillyard of the Law Society dated 20 November 1984 which said that after the abolition of the Greater London Council Government policy would be to provide traditional support for London boroughs to help individual local authorities to take on support for purely local organisations or projects.

In its 34th annual report, published in January 1985, the Legal Aid Advisory Committee made two significant recommendations in paragraph 441. The first was that the law centres should be treated as an essential part of the national network of legal services. The second recommendation was that the first priority should be to ensure the survival of existing law centres without waiting for changes in local government and urban programme policies to see what support borough councils and district councils could provide.

I shall be very interested in the Government's response on the funding of law centres. At present both individuals and local councils are caught in a "Catch 22" type dilemma. I raised this matter in a debate on 26 February 1985, but there has been no adequate long-term response by the Government. Tonight, I began by saying that law centres come within the category of funding of time expired projects. The needs of the inner cities are not time expired. The needs of the inner cities—the desperate unemployment and the chronic housing situation—have increased rather than decreased. The cases which are being brought and the grievances which are to be remedied have increased rather than decreased. Yet if a borough such as Lambeth were to take on a major share of the funding of law centres, with rate capping and ceilings on rate expenditure, it would have to choose between law centre provision, social services provision or provision, for example, for the 4,000 Cantonese refugees from Vietnam, who are in my constituency and whom I am glad to seek to help, but who are here as a result of Government policy and Government invitation. The local council would be in the invidious position of having to choose between cutting alternative projects for those in need. The catch 22 position is that if Lambeth were to support law centres, it would risk breaking the law itself by exceeding the rate capping limit.

I stress that if law centres do not continue to be funded by central Government, no Minister and no hon. Member should be surprised if people take the law into their own hands. This is an urgent and important matter on which we expect a significant response from the Government.

3.26 am

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): May I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) for having sought the debate? I am grateful to him for two reasons. First, he has raised a matter which is of considerable importance to the Labour party and which we take very seriously. My second reason for being grateful to him when he speaks of the work of the Benwell law centre and of the law centre in Gateshead is that he is speaking for the community in Tyneside. As his neighbour there, I appreciate the points which he made on behalf of the community that we both represent.

Before being elected to the House, I was a councillor for the Walker ward and an official of the General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union. As a full-time trade union official, I used to deal with the advice services that the union offered. In both that capacity and as a councillor I know that the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) are equally true for the community on Tyneside. Even as a Member of Parliament I often feel that I cannot give to all the cases that come to my surgery the in-depth attention which they deserve. If an hon. Member goes into a case as a professional adviser, he finds that he is neglecting other duties. As both my hon. Friends have emphasised, there is a need for independent advice based on something other than the more formal provision of legal services.

The debate touches on two strategic issues — the principle as to whether law centres are a good thing, and who should take responsibility for funding law centres and more general advice services. My hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge rightly quoted the 1979 report of the Royal Commission on legal services. In regard to the principle of the existence of law centres he could equally have quoted the 35th report of the Law Society, which said on page 57:

"The Society has continued to express concern to the Government about the severe effects on law centres and Citizens Advice Bureaux which may well result from the legislation abolishing the Greater London Council and the metropolitan county authorities. Law centres and advice agencies are also in an uncertain financial position as a result of other restrictions on local authority expenditure and changes in policy on the use of the Urban Programme. Urban Programme policy is now unhelpful to law centres and advice agencies. Bids for this form of funding have all been rejected by central government despite many being given high priority by their sponsoring local authorities."

That was the Law Society being supportive of law centres. Equally my hon. Friend the Member of Tyne Bridge could have quoted the Lord Chancellor's advisory committee on legal aid. The Lord Chancellor's own advisory committee is supportive of law centres. In other words, there is no lack of support for these centres, either in the legal profession or in the bodies most closely concerned with giving advice to those who are in charge of our legal services.

Even the Government seem to accept that law centres are, in principle, worth while. Earlier this week, at a meeting of the Advice Services Alliance, the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) said:

"Society would break down if it were not for the work of advice centres."

I regret that I came in part way through his remarks on that occasion. I may have missed his explanation of why the Government were being niggardly over the funding of law centres, which he said were essential to preserving the fabric of society.

The Labour party takes the view that the Lord Chancellor should take a lead in this matter. The whole issue of funding goes further than law centres and the nation's network of advice centres, citizens advice bureaux and so on. The overall provision of legal services faces a financial crisis greater than at any time in recent history.

The Solicitor-General will recall our recent debates on the funding of the new Crown prosecution service. I hope that we shall soon debate the cuts in legal aid provision. He will be aware of the litigation that is now taking place, with the Lord Chancellor being sued by members of the Bar because they regard their funding as inadequate and consider that their representations on the subject were not adequately considered.

[Mr. Nicholas Brown]

It is against that background that we are discussing, in proportionate terms, the small work of the law centres. It is not simply a question of the contribution that they make to the provision of legal services. We must bear in mind the work that they undertake. They do not cover the type of work that family solicitors do. Their work is different and they touch areas of the community that, by and large, solicitors do not reach. My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall cited examples from his constituency. Similar cases could be given from any inner city.

The Lord Chancellor continues to say that he will not take responsibility for the further funding of law centres. Indeed, he claims that he has no statutory power to do so. That is a red herring because the last Labour Lord Chancellor found it possible to take on the funding of time-expired law centre projects in inner cities. The present Government continue to fund those projects but refuse to take on any new law centres.

My hon. Friends and I gave the Government an opportunity, during the passage of the Administration of Justice Act, to give the Lord Chancellor the powers he needed to provide the necessary funding. It was clear from the Government's arguments on that occasion that not only did the Lord Chancellor not have the necessary powers to fund law centres, but that he did not wish to have such powers. The argument is that these are matters for local provision, not that there will be any extra local funding for it—funding must be from existing resources. All credit is due to Newcastle city council for taking on the Benwell law centre in spite of being rate-capped and having to find the money from stretched resources. That demonstrates the commitment that the local representatives give the law centre's work. It is wholly reprehensible that the Government do not share that commitment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall was right to stress independence. An organisation that is to provide advice should be independent of the local authority, as many of the issues that it will deal with concern the local authority. My experience is that the local authority as landlord is often involved. We can test the sincerity of the Government's argument about local responsibility in the case of a new law centre for Huddersfield. I understand that the Department of the Environment is considering whether it should be provided with urban aid as a new project. Kirklees council, which has submitted the bid, has made it a priority. That is the local view. I hope that, at least for the experimental period, the Department will feel able to let such a bid go through. If it does not, that will show what a sham and a hypocrisy is the Government's claim that these matters should be determined locally. The Government will be saying that the Lord Chancellor should not provide central funding and that although there is local support for a scheme, it should not go ahead.

Law centres serve the very inner-city communities that are bearing the brunt of the recession. Law centres do not touch on the generality of solicitors' work but provide a service that would not be provided otherwise, except by volunteers and diligent councillors and Members of Parliament who have limited provisions for staff, most of whom are underpaid or volunteers. Their work touches on that done by other advice agencies and the trade union movement. Their resources are stretched and they spend much of their time worrying about funding and whether they will continue. Against that sorry background, we are asserting, on behalf of the Parliamentary Labour party, the case for law centres and the case for Government funding.

I should like to conclude by mentioning something that always irritates me when we have these debates at 3.30 am. When I attended the meeting to which I referred earlier, a representative of the Conservative party was present, as was a representative of the Liberal party in the form of its environment spokesman, and, quite separately, there was a representative of the Social Democratic party. They claim to be two separate parties. It has emerged that they have two, three or perhaps four policies. Always, when there is a public platform their righteous views—often their self-righteous views—will be expressed.

But whenever I am here making out a case in the early hours of the morning, as I have a duty to do on behalf of the Opposition, not a spokesman of the alliance is present. In Committee stage on Bills it is left to the Government and the Opposition to conduct debates until the early hours of the morning. Alliance Members do not show their faces. Even in the morning Committee debates they turn up, make their speeches and go away again. Then they have the nerve to suggest that they are something new in politics. They are not; they are something very old in politics—skivers. They do not turn up when they ought to.

The Solicitor-General and I are used to looking at each other across the Despatch Box in the early hours of the morning because of the workings of the Consolidation Bill procedure. I appreciate that the Solicitor-General has come here to tell us the Government's views on these matters. My only fear is that he will say that he has come here as the agent of the Lord Chancellor. I am afraid that the Lord Chancellor, as we already know, has little sympathy for the case that we have made out tonight.

3.43 am

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I, too, join in expressing my appreciation of the value of the service rendered by the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) in giving us this opportunity to discuss the standing, future and funding of law centres.

I share a certain amount of sympathy, too, for what has been said about the so-called alliance parties by the Opposition Front Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), who is the hon. Gentleman's parliamentary neighbour in the north-east. I can contribute an illustration of the propensity to which the hon. Gentleman has just referred from a Committee in which I took part recently. A representative of the SDP-Liberal alliance declared his opinion that the amendment under discussion had not been made out in argument, whereupon he voted for it. Engagingly, he declared himself to be in two minds and rather split, a difficulty which he was frank enough to describe as not unfamiliar to him and his colleagues.

I listened with care to what the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge said about the two law centres in his constituency. I have particulars of the funding that each of them has received. Benwell law centre has received a grant of £65,000, which expires in 1986. The Gateshead law centre received a grant of £59,000. As the hon. Gentleman said, the arrangements for that funding expire in 1987. I was very glad to hear that Newcastle city council has taken over the funding of the Benwell centre. I say that because I take the view that law centres are, to use the words of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East very largely a good thing, for the reasons expressed tonight, especially those put forward by the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland), in whose constituency I lived before he took responsibility for it.

I well understand some of the problems that come the way of law centres in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. In the main, law centres deal valuably with those problems. That is my position, and I believe that it is the attitude of the entire Government.

The Government must take into account the second of the issues which the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East identified: who should be responsible for the funding? There is no conflict between the views that I have just expressed and the view that has been taken consistently by the Government and their predecessors that, with the exception of seven law centres which the previous Lord Chancellor made a commitment to fund, law centres should be funded from local sources. The most obvious source is the local authority. It is the most obvious, but it is not the only one available. In a recent debate in another place, a persuasive case was made for the practicability and desirability of law centres looking elsewhere in their communities — perhaps to local businesses—for their funding.

My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, for whom I must appear as agent or spokesman, has consistently taken that view. It may be helpful if I explained a little about it. The Government's policy, which has been made abundantly clear, is that the appropriate source of funds is a local one.

It is interesting that the first law centre was established only in 1970. About 59 of them have been established piecemeal in response to perceived local needs, and they have obtained their funds from a variety of public and charitable sources. It is right that several reports from the Royal Commission on Legal Services and the Lord Chancellor's Advisory Committee on Legal Aid have recommended that law centres should become an integral part of the provision by central Government of legal services to the public, that there should be a considerable expansion in their number, and that they should receive central Government support through the Lord Chancellor's Department.

The Government do not dispute the usefulness of law centres in some areas, as shown in those reports, and most recently in the report of the Archbishop of Canterbury's commission on urban priority areas. However, the Government do not accept that law centres are agencies for which central Government should assume direct and general responsibility. In the White Paper, "The Government Response to the Report of the Royal Commission on Legal Services", the Government said:

> "The needs of the public for legal assistance are most appropriately met by lawyers acting in private practice supplemented, where this suits local circumstances, by law centres."

The White Paper also said that the Government did not believe that a sufficient case had been made for direct ministerial responsibility for the availability of legal services in any area.

I note the point made by the hon. Member for Vauxhall in his illustration of the difficult school case. He said that, in such a case, someone could not go to a solicitor and expect a similar investigation. I understand that point. But there is a wide range of local advisory services, including the citizens advice bureaux, which the Royal Commission saw as the front-line provider of such services. If I remember correctly—and I believe that I am right—there still exists in Lambeth the Stockwell "good neighbour" scheme. I would be surprised if there were not others of a similar character in other districts of the hon. Member's constituency, which attract people of good will and expertise, and which would be able to help in the kind of case that he mentioned, without a law centre having to be available.

Mr. Stuart Holland: I am grateful to the hon. and learned Member. He may or may not be aware that the Stockwell and Clapham law centre, for example, has been living from hand to mouth since this time last year because of uncertainty over its funding. I am grateful to him for taking seriously the point which I have raised about inner-city stress. What I would like him to address himself to is how centres can be funded in the context of rate capping. Or, granted the financial pressures on councils, who will provide the safety valve by means of which people can see that they have redress for their grievances through an intermediate procedure, rather than going to the courts. We need more professionalism than simply comes from a "good neighbour" scheme, however well intentioned.

The Solicitor-General: I quite see that local authorities have to operate within the same margins of financial restraint as affect a great many other bodies, including Government Departments, these days. It comes down to a matter of priority. Newcastle city council has found it possible, notwithstanding the other claims made upon it, to take on the funding of the Benwell law centre. I do not doubt that that city council considers itself hard pressed, as many others do, yet it has been able to take on that funding of £65,000. I would not wish to put it on the basis of "where there's a will there's a way", but this illustrates that it is possible.

It is very difficult to gainsay this answer to the hon. Gentleman, that it is a matter of priorities. I agree that where one has had a grant upon which one has come to rely, and where that grant is either taken away or curtailed, one will experience a great deal of anxiety and uncertainty. I sympathise with those who are running law centres and who are in that position. Equally, I am not surprised that local authorities may have been holding out until the last minute, in the hope that representations such as those made this evening would bear fruit and that local authorities would not have to follow the example of Newcastle city council because the money would be made available by Government. I am afraid that I cannot hold out the prospect that the money will be so provided.

I should like also to say a word about the local authorities in this context, because the point has been made that one cannot really expect the local authorities to take on the funding of a law centre which may be financing cases by clients against the council itself. I know that there have been one or two instances of difficulty in that regard. It is regrettable. I regard them as being in the minority. The point is that many law centres are supported by local authorities, acting individually or under the urban programme, and these local authorities implicitly accept that a law centre has a duty to act in a client's best interests, whoever the other party may be. It is, I think, generally agreed that it would be very unreasonable for a local authority to refuse support for, or to withdraw support from, a law centre because it was, for instance, representing a council house tenant in dispute with the council as housing authority. It would be a rare case in which a local authority withdrew or withheld support on that ground.

I do not think that the claims of law centres for funding can be taken in isolation from other demands on the necessarily limited resources available to the public sector. It is for each individual authority to reach its own decision as to how best it applies the funds that it has available to it. But in the context of the abolition of the metropolitan councils and the GLC on 1 April, it should be borne in mind that local authorities in those areas will, after 1 April, be freed from paying precepts to their respective upper tier authorities. Those subject to rate limitation could apply for a variation of those limitations. In considering such applications the Secretary of State must have regard statutorily to the extent of the authority's commitment to the voluntary sector. That is a significant feature.

I want to return to the point made by the hon. Member for Vauxall about the pressures that exist in an area where there is perceived to be antagonism and, to take his example, discrimination on the part of certain police officers against sectors of the community. I note the tribute that the hon. Gentleman paid to senior police officers in his constituency, but he says that there have been too many instances at lower levels of discrimination and unlawful behaviour on the part of the police.

Under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 there exists a new and independent Police Complaints Authority. Under the same Act there is now provision, established by the Lord Chancellor, for a 24-hour duty solicitor scheme, whereby access to a solicitor is available on legal aid for somebody who is in a police station, having been arrested. That goes to mitigate the consequences of that which the hon. Gentleman has been describing. It is quite a significant improvement and one for which the Lord Chancellor, who has come in for a fair amount of stick tonight, can take the credit.

Mr. Stuart Holland: I am not sure whether it is part of the hon. and learned Gentleman's constituency experience, but it is certainly part of mine, that if an individual wishes to bring a complaint, for example, through the police complaints procedure, and that individual is not so well schooled as the hon. and learned Gentleman and I might be so fortunate to be, it is extremely useful for a law centre to be able to assist in the formulation of that submission to the Police Complaints Authority. Those factors should no be underestimated, certainly when taken in conjunction with the limited effectiveness of the previous police complaints procedure and the as yet—in my view and I think that of several other hon. Members—not wholly proven track record of the new procedure.

The Solicitor-General: I am sure that it is useful, but it is not indispensable by any means. There is now a sophisticated system which means that once a complaint has been made, however unschooled it may be, it really cannot be stopped. The complaint is registered and it has to be investigated under the supervision of the Police Complaints Authority. In the course of investigation, whatever may be lacking in detail and clarity in the original complaint will be supplemented and made good. It is said that there is an unproven track record. Have a heart. The thing has been going for only a short time. But it is an independent body and it is respectably staffed.

Let me say a little more about the extension to legal aid and advice that the Lord Chancellor has produced. They are clear indications of the importance which the Government attach to legal aid. Expenditure on legal aid has more than doubled in real terms since 1979. The Government have extended the scope of the legal aid and advice scheme in the past few years, for example, by the introduction of formal arrangements for the duty solicitor scheme in magistrates' courts, the 24-hour duty solicitor scheme which I have already mentioned for suspects held in custody, the provision of payments to solicitors and counsel on account of legal aid bills, extension of the assistance by way of representation scheme to proceedings in the mental health review tribunals and an increase in the capital allowance for applicants for ABWOR to £3,000. I think that those are signiicant improvements which demonstrate the Government's commitment to legal aid.

As I have said, legal aid, and law centres in particular, cannot expect to be exempted from the constraints of financial stringency which affect us all at the moment. Therefore, I should like to end as I began by expressing my understanding of the anxieties that are felt by those who run legal aid centres, but I should like to revert to the point that just as legal aid centres originated because of the perceived local need for help, so the best sources of funds remain in their own localities. I believe that because those who provide the money tend to wish to have some control over the operation of whatever is being funded it is better that those local centres, responding to local needs, should look to the local authorities and to other local sources for the funds that are needed for the work that they do.

I realise that it would be nice at 4 o'clock in the morning if I could end with something that those who have initiated the debate would like to hear. I hope that I have at least given a genuine indication of my sympathy for the work of the law centres, but I am afraid that I cannot hold out any prospect of the Government acceding to the request that they should take over a statutory responsibility for funding.

Transport (West Yorkshire)

4.2 am

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): My hon. Friend the Minister of State may not be as glad as I am to be here at 4 o'clock in the morning. Nevertheless, we much appreciate the contribution he makes in the office that he fills. I am also pleased that the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) is here. He demonstrates every day, in Committee and when he contributes to transport debates, that it is possible to adopt an aggressive yet light-hearted tone across the Dispatch Boxes. We welcome the fact that he has stayed up until this late hour to join in this important debate about transport in west Yorkshire.

I think that it is fair to say that, among the factors which encourage the development of industry and commerce in particular areas, there is good evidence that transport links figure very near the top. I want to deal, in particular, with the western part of the county of west Yorkshire, which not only suffers from higher than average unemployment but has relatively poor road and rail communications. In the eastern part of west Yorkshire, Leeds and Wakefield have first-class rail links to London by the east coast main line and also first-class road links by the M1 motorway to the south of the country. However, places such as Bradford, Halifax and Huddersfield come some way behind.

Leeds has attracted many new jobs in commerce and the services sector, but Bradford and its environs are still trying to recover from the shake-out in textile jobs which has taken place under successive Governments over many years and has reached a plateau only during the past 12 months or so. My constituency is defying the doom and gloom merchants and many firms are now more optimistic, although it remains to be seen whether that will turn into real jobs. Keighley is particularly poorly served by transport. Whether those jobs will come depends a great deal on the realisation of our transport needs.

Among the most important developments is the electrification of the east coast main line. Its completion to Doncaster and Leeds is eagerly awaited by the many people who use the train regularly, including me, and by tose who suffer from the delays caused by the many failures of the current diesel units. The fact that British Rail received substantial compensation from the manufacturer is little confort to those who are inconvenienced. The Government made the right decision in giving the go-ahead for this important and significant scheme. The increased reliability which the new Electra locomotives will bring is eagerly awaited also.

We are pleased that my hon. Friend the Minister will visit Bradford soon. Many people in Bradford are naturally unhappy about the link between the city and the rest of the inter-city network, especially the route between Bradford and Leeds. I understand that the existing dated rolling stock which is operated by the passenger transport executive is being replaced by the new Pacer train. That development is badly needed.

Many people in Bradford regard electrification of the route between Leeds and Bradford as essential to Bradford's regeneration. I must admit that, unlike some hon. Members, I do not believe that this argument necessarily stands up to rigorous examination. Decisions made by the great railway builders of the last century inevitably cause the journey time from Wakefield to Bradford to be long, especially if the train has to stop at Leeds on the way. British Rail claims that a stop at Leeds between Wakefield and Bradford has been forced on it by commercial considerations. It has already ceased to run trains via the Wortley curve directly to Bradford.

The time factor has in the past deterred passengers from travelling through to Bradford by train even when no change of train was required during off-peak periods. This factor will continue to apply whether or not electrification comes. At the end of the day, whether a service is viable depends not on electrification but on whether sufficient passengers use it. I know that there is criticism of British Rail for making the service so unattractive that passengers are driven away, but I do not think that it is all the fault of British Rail that the number of passengers using the inter-city service during off-peak periods declined to such a low level that services were discontinued.

There has never been any suggestion that, if electrification were continued through from Leeds to Bradford, British Rail would again start running through trains during off-peak periods. It is hard to see what advantage electrification can bring to make the service more attractive. On that basis, it is reasonable to assume that the electrified inter-city services would continue through to Bradford only during peak periods. British Rail has already said that it intends to continue inter-city services to Bradford during peak periods following electrification of the east coast main line, with a change of traction at Leeds during the time currently allowed for the stop there.

Therefore, the only advantage that I can see that electrification would provide is a kind of guarantee that British Rail would be more likely—it is certainly not a cast-iron guarantee — to fulfil its pledge to continue inter-city sevices to Bradford than it would if a change of traction were necessary.

I believe that better ways can be found of spending the several millions of pounds — various figures, ranging from £5 million to £10 million, have been cited—that such a guarantee would cost. The question of the Wortley curve is separate and not directly related to electrification. It is connected with the question whether it is commercially viable to run trains through to Bradford which do not call at Leeds. It looks as if the courts will have to decide whether British Rail was justified in closing that stretch of line to passengers without submitting the issue to a Transport Users Consultative Committee inquiry and final decision by the Secretary of State.

We live in an age of convenience, but I do not understand how electrification can make things more convenient unless one were willing not only to spend the £4 million, £5 million or £10 million needed to electrify the link, but also to maintain a continuing subsidy each year for uneconomic trains.

Some Bradfordians have admitted that electrification would not make economic sense but would have a psychological effect. British Rail is required to achieve a 5 per cent. return on its inter-city services by 1988. I am not sure where a subsidy would come from. Even if Bradford council was initially willing for the ratepayers to meet the cost, it could hardly give a guarantee to continue doing that indefinitely. No doubt one would come to a different conclusion if it seemed that electrification could bring any genuine benefits to Bradford. I find it difficult to argue that there should be any exception from the requirement that the inter-city service should be ineligible for public service obligation grant from April 1988, bearing in mind that this additional investment would incur additional costs if BR were to try to justify it by running through trains outside peak periods.

I should like to make some relatively brief comments about local rail lines as these are not the responsibility of BR or of my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Transport but of the local PTE. The reason for that is not because they are unimportant; indeed, the contrary is the case.

Many commuters, shoppers, school pupils and tourists depend on the local rail lines between the major conurbations of Leeds and Bradford and the towns of Shipley, Bingley, Keighley and Skipton in Airedale and the smaller communities on the way to Ilkley in Wharfedale. In recent months there have been many complaints about the quality of the service. I would like to pay a tribute to the Wharfedale rail users group whose professionalism has impressed the professionals and whose suggestions have resulted in the improved scheduling of trains. The Ilkley line is popular with travellers but its viability is not enhanced by the way that section 20 agreements between the PTE and BR require the whole of the track costs to be borne by the former because the line is not part of the BR network.

The details of section 20 agreements are being re-examined and I hope that some benefits will result. In the meantime, I believe that the PTE should operate its fare structure on a more commercial basis. The local railway provides a fast alternative to the congested roads for which many people would willingly pay a realistic fare if that helped to retain the service. People need the service to be reliable and seats to be available. Lately, both timing and the number of coaches available have fallen well below acceptable levels. I hope that things will improve in future.

I have some good news for my hon. Friend the Minister of State about the likely effects of the Transport Bill for which he was responsible. I do not know whether my hon. Friend has seen a letter from County Councillor John Tweddle, who is the Conservative spokesman on transport on the county council. In the letter Mr. Tweddle refers to "The latest information on the charges which the Transport Act 1985 is bringing about to bus services in West Yorkshire."

He states:

"The west Yorkshire Passenger Transport Executive have just informed Councillors that commercial network mileage has been increased from 55 per cent. previously assessed to 75 per cent. of the current mileage. This improvement is to be achieved as a result of better service planning, faster journey times and improved staff productivity following the new cooperation from the Trade Unions. National Bus Company Subsidiaries operating in west Yorkshire, have not yet told of the extent of the commercial network that they intend to register".

Nevertheless, the sort of improvement in the commercial network mileage, together with the cost savings on the rest of the network due to tendering, is obviously going to save passengers and ratepayers a substantial amount in the future.

Mr. Tweddle concludes his letter by writing:

"The claim of the white paper and in debate now looks set to be achieved scorning the mis-information and scare-mongering of opponents to the Transport Bill."

That is encouraging news indeed.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East) Did the hon. Gentleman say that the spokesman of the Conservative group was County Councillor Tweddle, or was that the content of the letter from which he quoted?

Mr. Waller: County Councillor Tweddle is a man for whom I have the highest regard. I always found what he has to say about transport, in which he is a specialist, of extremely high quality. The hon. Gentleman will probably see more of Mr. Tweddle in future. He has already been a parliamentary candidate, and is undoubtedly destined for even higher things than the outgoing metropolitan county council.

One of the more obvious benefits of the abolition of the metropolitan county councils was the opportunity it gave the districts to take responsibility for highways. There is a good case for some services still to be provided on a countywide basis, for example research, and work on major strategic traffic management schemes. Nevertheless, I am surprised that some district councils in west Yorkshire are effectively throwing away the opportunities that they were handed by reorganisation by continuing to join together on a countywide basis to operate highway functions voluntarily.

I am glad that Bradford has opted out of that retrograde scheme, and I believe that it will benefit in future by so doing. If the old county borough was capable of running its highways, the much larger metropolitan district with a population as large as some counties should certainly be able to do so effectively.

One of the most important trunk road schemes in the offing is the Kirkhamgate-Dishforth scheme. The need for a strategic link between the M1 and M62 south of Leeds, and north Yorkshire and the north-east remains. Much national and local traffic must use a variety of roads which are unsuited to the flows that they must carry. There was a good case for a route to the west of Leeds which would have benefited Bradford and provided an alternative to the dangerous route north from those cities to Harrogate and Ripon. But we did not get the cake with the icing, and because the inspector did not recommend the construction of the entirely new section south and east of Leeds either, we have got only half of the alternative rather plain cake.

Now new alternatives are to be examined, and that process should be carried out quickly. The problem exists today and we cannot wait many more years for it to be properly resolved, even if the necessary improvements on the A1 are to go ahead.

I welcome the fact that active consideration is being given to the construction of an eight or nine mile link between the M1 near Wakefield, possibly between junctions 39 and 40, and the M62 at junction 25 near Brighouse. I have been pressing for that scheme for many years. Two or three years ago I was told by officials in the Department that it was a non-starter, but I am pleased that it is now considered that it may pay its way.

The scheme would bring considerable benefits to the western districts of west Yorkshire. It would provide a faster, more convenient route between the M1 and Huddersfield, Halifax and Bradford, would cut several miles off the journey between the M1 and the M62 to the west, and would relieve the A638 through Heckmondwike and Cleckheaton — towns which I had the honour to represent before the last general election but which I no longer represent. The traffic in those towns was considered sufficiently bad to merit the construction of relief roads which have now been deleted.

This new route would also relieve the A644 through Mirfield and traffic would be able to use an alternative to the unsuitable, and in parts narrow, A637. It would enable the largest proportion of traffic linking between the M62 and M606 at the Chain Bar roundabout to do so without having to negotiate that roundabout—it is about half a mile around that large circuit. The Calder Valley link would have environmental, safety and economic benefits which would justify its early approval and construction. I hope the results of the analysis will prove favourable.

For my constituents the Airedale route is of great significance. It is a vital route for the future prosperity of the Aire valley towns, especially Keighley. When the route is complete it will mean that there will be a fast link between Keighley and the motorway network. At present in peak times it can easily take an hour to cover 15 miles. It is possible to get from south Bradford to Manchester more quickly than it is possible to reach the north-western parts of the district. That route, which has been on the stocks not just for years but decades, is essential.

The final obstacles to the construction of the Kildwick to Beechcliffe section—the most westerly part of the route — have now been cleared and I hope that construction will start this summer. There has been a recent announcement about the Victoria Park-Keighley-Crossflats section. That will mean the loss of about 13 per cent. of the Victoria Park at Keighley, but I do not think, as some fear, that the annual gala and show at Keighley, which are important events for the town, will be threatened too much.

The Crossflatts-to-Cottingley Bar section extending to the east of Bingley will go ahead eventually. There is a question about what will happen between Cottingley Bar and the Shipley eastern bypass. This will link with the Bradford central spine road and the motorway system. I have serious doubts about the consultative process which was carried out some time ago. I do not think that adequate opportunity was given for the people living outside the immediate area to express their views as there would have been under a statutory inquiry. I carried out a survey of Keighley firms which clearly showed that the overwhelming majority regarded the route as important and thought that it was essential that there should be a new route skirting Saltaire and Shipley. Those questioned did not think that any alternative would prevent traffic jams.

An alternative to the new route would probably rely on traffic management and perhaps on one or two short new sections, but all this would only create an almighty snarl-up which would strangle Saltaire—an outcome which those who wish to protect Saltaire fear. The anticipated traffic figures which I have been given by the Department of Transport do not add up. Even an incomplete Airedale route would draw traffic away from routes such as the A629-A644 through Denholme and Queensbury and the B6144 across the moors. I feel that there could be a botch-up and I am waiting anxiously for the announcement, due this summer, of the outcome of inquiries into alternatives. I note that I am supported in my view by Bradford council and the West Yorkshire metropolitan council. It is a sensitive matter.

Among the villages which have waited long—I will not say patiently—for a bypass, Addingham, on the borders of my constituency, features prominently. At long last, the detailed route has been announced. I believe it has the support of the overwhelming majority of the village residents who wish to see the bypass constructed as soon as possible.

Obviously, the objectors have every right to have their say, but I hope that their number will be few and that the statutory procedures will be carried through as speedily as possible. The road winds through the village in an attractive way that is suited more to the horse and cart than to today's juggernaut. The completion of the bypass, which will be partly hidden in a cutting will bring blessed relief to the villagers, who often have to jump for their lives, and have been kept awake at night by the rumble of heavy traffic.

The Leeds-Bradford airport has a catchment area twice the size of that for Newcastle or the east midlands, but has only about half the throughput of those two airports. It has great potential. For instance, it could carry a great deal of postal business, some of which used to be diverted through Speke airport at Liverpool. Last year, the operational income of Leeds-Bradford airport increased by 24 per cent., mainly as a result of increased business. There was a 10 per cent. increase in air freight, and a 14 per cent. increase in passenger trade. However, it has had to turn away much business in the past two years because of the ban on take-offs and landings after 10 pm. The question whether there should be take-offs and landings after that time is a sensitive issue, and I do not want to come down on one side or the other, but it is fair to investigate the matter, bearing in mind that most of the present generation of quiet aircraft were not in existence when the public inquiry took place in 1979.

I hope that I shall be forgiven for reverting briefly to the subject of rail. This is not a part of the British Rail or PTE network, but the Keighley and Worth Valley Railway. I take a particular pride in that scheme, as did my predecessor as Member for Keighley, Mr. Bob Cryer. The railway is run in a very professional way, although it depends on volunteers and fare-paying passengers, and the subscriptions of members of the preservation society among whom I am proud to be counted. The figures that have just reached me show that in 1985, 148,500 miles were covered by locomotives on the railway, a large proportion of them under steam. Not only do people come from far and wide to work on the railway, or travel on it as tourists, but some use it as a commuter service from Oxenhope and the famous village of Howarth down into Keighley and on into Bradford and Leeds. The railway is more expensive to run than an ordinary railway because it is a steam railway. Over £40,000 per annum has to be spent on coal alone.

I am glad that in the past couple of days, a pie-in-the-sky scheme to build a tramway and transport museum on the other side of Bradford seems to have run into the buffers. It was an over-ambitious scheme on which the West Yorkshire metropolitan council has already spent some money. It was never a realistic scheme, and my view is that it would have confronted head-on the voluntary efforts of people on the Keighley and Worth Valley Railway. I had appealed for somebody to say no to the scheme, which would have eaten up a great deal of ratepayers' money, when they are already suffering from increased rates.

I have taken my hon. Friend the Minister and the many other hon. Members in the House at this time on a tour of the transport facilities in at least part of the county of west

[Mr. Waller]

Yorkshire. I hope that I have shown that transport is vital to the future of the county. During the next few years, it will be even more vital for the system to improve.

4.28 am

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): I would be stretching credulity to its limits if I said that the House was grateful to the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) for raising these matters at this time in the morning, but it does at least give us the opportunity to debate the transport infrastructure of west Yorkshire, for which, regardless of the lateness of the hour, we should be grateful.

I found much of what the hon. Member said fairly unexceptionable, except that, like a loyal parliamentary private secretary, it contained not a shred of criticism of Her Majesty's Government or their policies.

Mr. Waller: I am afraid that my horse was shot from under me when my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) was struck down in mid-flight.

Mr. Snape: It was a regrettable episode, and I am sorry that the striking down in mid-flight of the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) had such an enormous impact on his stable lad as well.

I thought the speech was more loyal than accurate, and it did not address itself to financial problems which the west Yorkshire conurbation will face, particularly after the abolition of the county council.

It is fascinating to hear some Tory Back Benchers talk about transport. The hon. Member for Keighley said that he would have difficulty in advocating subsidy for uneconomic trains. He said that he would not attempt to justify any grant to British Rail's inter city services after 1988-89, although he welcomed the east coast mainline electrification. A few minutes later, he demanded the expenditure of literally millions of pounds of public money on roads in the county wherein lies his own constituency. He wants a link between the M1 and the M62, and a link between the M62 and the M602, if I have the numbers right. This is millionss upon million of public money for the road network. Despite what Councillor Tweddle said about the future of buses in west Yorkshire once deregulation gets under way, presumably those of his constituents who do not have motor cars will spend their leisure hours watching all the bulldozers creating the new motorways, or better — or perhaps worse from their point of view—watching all those lovely lorries nose to tail on those two motorways.

Mr. Waller: If the hon. Gentleman recollects, he will remember that I suggested that there would be an economic return on the motorways or new roads that were built whether they are analysed by means of the Department's COBA system or any other system.

Mr. Snape: There is no doubt that, left to itself, the Department of Transport could find an economic return for a road through the Sahara desert. The day the Department of Transport under any Government and under any Minister evaluates road schemes in exactly the same way that it does rail schemes, or vice versa, I will start believing in some of the statistics which emanate from that Department. The justification for building roads can be, and is, churned out year after year under successive Governments. It is only railways that are not supposed to be subsidised or, if they are, the subsidy has to be so transparent that people like the hon. Gentleman can complain about it provided, of course, that the subsidy will not go to railway lines in and around his constituency.

The real meat of the debate, which the hon. Gentleman failed to reach, is what will happen to public transport in particular in west Yorkshire over the next few years.

Mr. Waller: It will be better.

Mr. Snape: The hon. Gentleman says that it will be better. He did not offer a shred of evidence to say that that is true.

I will try to put some evidence before the hon. Gentleman and the Minister to indicate that the reverse is true. On 12 February this year the Department of Transport issued a press release. It set the expenditure limits and the maximum precepts for all the passenger transport authorities, including the hon. Gentleman's, west Yorkshire. The limit was set on development at 26·51p. The preliminary expenditure limit for west Yorkshire had originally been set at £57·8 million and was redetermined to £61·3 million, giving that precept level of 26·51p. In the opinion of west Yorkshire county council, although I do not know what Councillor Tweddle thought about it, the approximate precept necessary to meet the PTA's own expenditure proposals, according to the Government's press release, was 34p. There is a considerable difference between the two of around 6 per cent. The hon. Member for Keighley blithely ignored those financial realities, so anxious was he to prove how wonderful a Minister is his hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Transport. Therefore, I shall be interested to hear from the Minister of State how west Yorkshire is to meet all the commitments that the hon. Member for Keighley just skated over, given the fact that its expenditure limit has been set at that level.

The press release then quoted what the Secretary of State for Transport had said:

> "This Order at last puts a stopper on the amounts which metropolitan ratepayers have in the past had to fork out year after year to subsidise wasteful public transport policies."

I do not know whether the hon. Member for Keighley thinks that the west Yorkshire passenger transport authority has been guilty of supporting wasteful public transport policies or whether he agrees with me that that is just the kind of ideological claptrap that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport has been expounding for far too many years.

The kind of nonsense that the Department of Transport indulges in nowadays was amply illustrated in a picture that appeared only a few days ago in a newspaper. The newly appointed Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport was no doubt set up by his civil servants to pose under Barton bridge on the other side of the Pennines. There is a £20 million scheme to widen that bridge from two lanes to three. There is no shortage of cash for that scheme, despite the fact that the Minister will tell us how hard pushed the Government are in meeting all their economic commitments. However, when it comes to public transport in the constituency of the hon. Member for Keighley, I am afraid that cash is so tight that, again in the words of the Secretary of State for Transport, the wasteful public transport policies of the west Yorkshire public transport authority cannot be paid for.

The impact of those restrictions on the precept limit for west Yorkshire are grim. In fact, they are, grimly enormous. The hon. Member for Keighley said that discussions are taking place on certain section 20 services. That is ne way of putting it. He might have said that Mr. Bill Cottham, the west Yorkshire passenger transport authority's director-general, has intimated total withdrawal of section 20 support for no fewer than six railway services in west Yorkshire. They are Huddersfield to Denby Dale; Huddersfield to Wakefield; Leeds, Castelford, Knottingly and Goole; Leeds to Ilkley, Bradford to Ilkley and—this is a route in which the hon. Member for Keighley might be interested—Bradford to Keighley.

It is strange——

Mr. Waller rose——

Mr. Snape: I shall give way in a moment. It is strange that in his paeans of praise for what the Government are up to the hon. Gentleman did not mention that fact. He said that discussions were taking place about the withdrawal of section 20 support.

Mr. Waller: The hon. Gentleman has got it wrong. There is no question of section 20 support being withdrawn from half the routes to which he referred. I understand that Mr. Cottham is bailing out of trains altogether and that he is going to run the bus company, now that the system has changed, following the passage of the Transport Act 1985.

Mr. Snape: I understand that West Yorkshire is bailing out of trains and intends to run buses in future, for reasons that I shall come to. No less than half of West Yorkshire's local railway passenger services are either up for closure or are suffering drastic cuts in service quality.

Over the past few years West Yorkshire has been positive towards its rail services. Passenger numbers on the services that I have mentioned and on others supported by the PTE have grown in contrast to an overall decline in the number of people using the buses. Many rail services have gained passengers following the opening of two new stations and the county has bought some new diesel trains. All these policies are now being put into reverse. Because of the Government's expenditure savings, the county council estimates, on my information that up to half the existing network and one third of train miles at present operated by the PTE could be reduced or withdrawn completely.

Mr. Waller: Could.

Mr. Snape: Yes, "could", according to the director-general. I do not want to insult the hon. Gentleman, but if I were told one story about the future of rail services in the county by the director-general of the PTE and a different story by the hon. Member for Keighley, even at the risk of upsetting the hon. Gentleman at 4.39 in the morning, I would put my trust in the professional rather than in, I shall not say the bumbling amateur, but, on his performance this morning, the grovelling amateur, the hon. Member for Keighley. He will have to accept that there are severe funding problems for the section 20 services in the county. Those problems are likely to lead to a switch from rail travel to bus support.

I always like to be fair about these matters. The Minister will be the first to concede that BR is far from blameless on the future of West Yorkshire's railway services. Again, Government targets on inter-city profitability have, according to BR, forced it to transfer inter-city services from the former Midland line, Leeds and York to Sheffield, even though that line has been extensively modernised. The Midland route's long term costs must now, according to BR, go to freight and regional passenger trains, most of which are assigned to the West Yorkshire PTE. West Yorkshire, understandably given its financial constraints, refuses to pick up the bill. So again there are financial problems for the recently modernised former Midland railway line.

Closure hearings have already taken place for the southern section from Normanton and Wakefield to South Yorkshire. New advance closure notices under section 54 cover the section from Normanton and Castleford to Leeds. They would lead to the closure of two commuter stations, Altofts and Woodlesford. That would mean the diversion of local Leeds-Sheffield trains and the circuitous and uncompetitive rerouteing of the Leeds-Knottingley-Goole service.

Another line which the hon. Gentleman did not mention in his somewhat carefree tour round West Yorkshire's railways is the Settle-Carlisle line, about which a series of public inquiries is to be held in the near future. BR's closure proposal would withdraw services from one of the most spectacular and scenic railway lines in Britain. I do not expect the Minister to comment on that, but the withdrawal of that service will have a knock-on cost effect on the West Yorkshire section of the line around the constituency of the hon. Member for Keighley. Surely that would aggravate the concern about the cost of lines from Leeds and Bradford to Keighley and Ilkley. It is already leading to drastic local service economies, with the retention of Leeds trains but a reduction in the Bradford services to a peak only service to Keighley. Those are the real financial problems for West Yorkshire, all of which the hon. Member for Keighley glossed over.

The chairman of the north-eastern transport users consultative committee, Mr. James Towler, recently said that his prime objective "is to see that the existing network, existing stations and, as far as possible, the existing services are maintained".

The TUCC has supported objectors' proposals for improved rail links. But fine words and TUCC reports might well, on past form, be ignored by the Secretary of State.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): Oh.

Mr. Snape: I do not know why the Minister is saying, "Oh." It is worse than I have indicated. When a railway line in the Tunbridge Wells area was recently put up for closure, the TUCC said that considerable hardship would result to those using it. That did not bother the Secretary of State. He promptly decided to close the line, anyway.

Mr. Mitchell rose——

Mr. Snape: Before I give way to the hon. Gentleman, I urge him to reflect on his own actions regarding railway lines. In other words, if he proposes to rise to defend the Secretary of State, he should first defend himself because, when replying to a similar debate a fortnight ago, he told me that he had not declined to give permission for a line to be electrified. He said exactly the opposite to that, however, in a written reply to me about the Manchester-Blackpool line, a topic to which I shall be returning on Monday. Does he still wish to rush in to defend his right hon. Friend?

Mr. Mitchell: I would not want the hon. Gentleman to mislead himself or the House into believing that my right hon. Friend had not taken full account of what was said by the TUCC in the case of the Tunbridge Wells-Erith line closure to which he referred. My right hon. Friend went so far as to secure the agreement of British Rail to provide a bus service from Groombridge—a town which might otherwise have suffered — direct to Tunbridge Wells. It would be wrong to give the impression that that town had been left isolated.

Mr. Snape: I did not say that the town had been left isolated. I said that the service had been withdrawn despite the recommendation of the TUCC and the hardship that would inevitably be caused to users of the line. Bus services do not normally last long when rail services are withdrawn, as the Minister knows. That has been the experience of the last 20 years.

The position in west Yorkshire is as I have described it, rather than the sunny, optimistic picture painted by the hon. Member for Keighley. We hope that despite the Government's interference with the right of locally elected representatives to opt for the transport system they want, BR will be able to keep things going at least until the next general election. But the future looks bleak indeed, even if the hon. Member for Keighley will not admit it.

Councillor Tweddle must be the only person to believe that bus deregulation will mean an increase in services. Not even the Minister, who at least tries to sound like an optimist, has claimed that. With bus deregulation and metropolitan county abolition — bearing in mind that about 26 per cent. of all BR's east coast main line passengers begin their journeys on feeder rail services— the Government's pulling of the financial rug from the west Yorkshire and Tyne and Wear passenger executives will undermine the financial prospectus for inter city routes and local passenger trains.

The situation is bleak indeed and I fear that the price of the Government's neglect—indeed, positive hatred— of local passenger services and transport initiatives in west Yorkshire may deprive the House of the privilege of the presence of the hon. Member for Keighley after the next general election. That will give him time to reflect that if he had protested a little louder and been a little less loyal to his party, west Yorkshire might have had better public transport services and he might still have had a seat in this House.

4.49 am

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) has spoken robustly on behalf of his constituents, as he always does. I am not sure that he would wish me to congratulate him on his good fortune, as it is 4.49 am

We have had an interesting and important debate. My hon. Friend mentioned the quality of Bradford's rail links and the rest of the rail network. I am aware of his and other hon. Members' anxiety about rail services to Bradford, especially the inter-city service. The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) secured an Adjournment debate on rail services to Bradford last November, since when there has been correspondence.

I have accepted an invitation to visit Bradford next Wednesday, 19 March. My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley, like the hon. Member for Bradford, West has been anxious for me to pay that visit, and my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler) will be present. I can assure all three that I shall travel to Bradford by inter-city service, changing at Leeds and that the programme arranged for my visit will give me an opportunity to meet BR's passengers, and representatives from several interest groups, including the chamber of commerce, the university, the transport users' consultative committee and Age Concern, and to discuss issues of concern with the city council and Members of Parliament.

I have no doubt that the visit will be interesting and useful, but I must emphasise, as did my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State in reply to the Adjournment debate last November, that the quality and level of services on routes and their timetabling are entirely matters for the BR Board. Ministers have no powers to interfere. The Government have set a framework of objectives for the board. We have emphasised that rail services should be reliable, attractive and punctual at acceptable fares and charges. It is for the board to manage the network in the framework of those objectives. For the inter-city sector, we have set the board a commercial target. We have asked the chairman to ensure that it achieves a 5 per cent. return on assets by 1988-89 and said that, from 1 April 1988, the sector will not be eligible for public service obligation grant. That approach is consistent with the firm policy of successive Governments that there is no justification for subsidising inter-urban transport whether it is provided by rail, road or air.

Mr. Snape: Can I draw attention, in my tentative fashion, to the fact that the Department has subsidised road haulage for donkeys' years and shows every sign of continuing to do so, not least because, when their own figures show that the heaviest lorries do not meet their true track cost, the Government move the goalposts in an attempt to prove that they do?

Mr. Mitchell: Perhaps we could debate expenditure on roads and the contribution made by road users some other time. The hon. Gentleman jolly well ought to know that road users contribute considerably more than is spent on the road system. BR's inter-city sector is already under a strong challenge from airline and coach operators, and it is beginning to respond well.

My hon. Friend referred to the board's proposals in respect of the Wortley curve. I understand that an application for a judicial review of the board's decision not to implement the statutory closure proceedings for that stretch of line has been granted, so hon. Members will understand that it would not be appropriate for me to comment. The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) was worried about the future of the Wharfedale and Airedale lines. Both of them are supported by the passenger transport executive through section 20 agreements. I shall return to the hon. Gentleman's point later.

As hon. Members will be aware, decisions on the level of financial support for local rail services in west Yorkshire are a matter for the passenger transport authority and its PTE. That is as it should be. PTAs and their executives are in the best position to judge the value of local rail services within the overall provision of public transport in their areas. The fact that the decisions rest with local bodies means that no one in Government can ever give an absolute assurance of support for a particular service. However, if the PTE were to withdraw its support for the service, British Rail could not withdraw passenger services from the line unless and until the proposal had been considered in the statutory procedure and the Secretary of State had decided to give consent to the proposal. The procedure allows objections to be made and fully considered before the Secretary of State comes to a conclusion.

Mr. Snape rose——

Mr. Mitchell: I intend to return to some of the points that the hon. Gentleman has made and seeks to make, when I have dealt with other aspects of railways raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley.

Mr. Snape: I am grateful to the Minister, but he should not allow himself to read out such dishonest claptrap. Will he tell the House how it is possible for local people to make local decisions when his boss, the Secretary of State, issues press releases saying that he will stop what he calls wasteful public expenditure on public transport? To do that, he is deliberately restricting the money available, so preventing those local people from making local decisions.

Mr. Mitchell: Clearly, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should not have given way to the hon. Gentleman. I had every intention of dealing with the rubbish that the hon. Gentleman spoke from the Dispatch Box. If he will allow me to take my speech in its proper sequence, he will find that I have great pleasure in rubbishing what he had to say when he addressed the House earlier.

Hon. Members have expressed disappointment with the fact that the British Rail Board does not propose to electrify the link between Bradford and the east coast main line. I understand that BR considered the case for electrifying the line between Bradford and Leeds in 1982, but found that it could justify spending only some £2 million to £3 million against an estimated cost for the scheme of £10 million.

It has been suggested that appraisals of possible electrification schemes, such as that between Leeds and Bradford, should not be determined solely on a commercial basis. We believe firmly, however, that BR's inter-city sector, where the responsibility for the Leeds to Bradford electrification scheme should fall, should operate and invest efficiently. In making investment proposals for the inter-city sector, BR must demonstrate a commercial rate of return.

West Yorkshire passengers, including Bradford ones, should benefit from the east coast main line electrification scheme, which will be completed to Leeds in 1989. I understand that, with the electrification scheme, BR has no plans to withdraw through services to Bradford. I am happy to give my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley that assurance. The services will be provided with the very latest rolling stock. The locomotive will be changed at Leeds.

The electrification of the east coast main line has a value of more than £3 million, which is the largest BR investment scheme for more than 25 years. BR was able to put forward a good financial case for the scheme, and we were glad to give it our approval. It is an example of our commitment to a modern and efficient railway system and it should bring significant benefits to the people of Yorkshire.

My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley also referred to the private steam conserved line—the Keighley and Worth Valley Line. I join him in paying tribute to the enterprising people who run preserved railways in different parts of the country. I have had the opportunity of visiting several of them. I was most impressed by the enthusiasm, skill and professionalism of those running such railway lines. I am a member of the North Yorkshire Moors Railway Preservation Society, and I have been involved with the Watercress Line. I join my hon. Friend in warmly congratulating those who are involved with the preserved lines.

My hon. Friend mentioned trunk road schemes in and around his constituency. We expect to start three important schemes in west Yorkshire in 1986. My hon. Friend will be pleased to know that starts are planned on two sections of the Airedale route in his constituency—Kildwick to Beechcliffe and Victoria Park to Crossflatts. Those schemes are part of the improved trunk road for Aire valley. We also plan to start work on a much-needed bypass of Wetherby on the A1 following a decision in December on the Kirkhamgate to Dishforth proposals.

I acknowlege that the Airedale route is of prime importance. The new road links to the Aire valley are of considerable importance. My hon. Friend is disappointed with the decision, confirmed last year, to terminate the route at Cottingley Bar near Bingley, but the announcement made it clear that a new road through the Saltaire-Shipley corridor would be unacceptable to local people. Alternative routes were examined carefully, but would cause considerable environmental damage. Therefore, we see the need to concentrate on new sections that we can build plus improvements to the existing road east of Cottingley Bar. As my hon. Friend knows, we are already consulting on the form of junction arrangement at Cottingley Bar. The chosen design will be included in proposals for the Crossflatts to Cottingley Bar section. Publication of the proposals is planned for later this year.

We also plan to hold public consultation about improvements to the existing road east of Cottingley Bar and the Shipley eastern bypass, which will link the improvements being planned by the local authority in Bradford. My hon. Friend said that he was worried about some aspects of this. I shall draw his concern to the attention of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State who has prime responsibility for roads.

Another important scheme in my hon. Friend's constituency is the Addingham bypass. I am pleased to note the interested local response to the exhibition of proposals. Many people share the view that has been expressed that work on this should be started quickly, but we must consider objections before reaching a conclusion about a public inquiry. A few miles to the west, but just in west Yorkshire, a bypass of Draughton is planned. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will make an announcement on it in the spring.

On the A65, a bypass is planned for Burley in Wharfedale. We shall publish proposals for this during the summer. Many people are lookig forward to relief from trunk road traffic. Improvements are planned on the A1 between Scotch Corner and the Bramham crossroads, at A64 junction north-east of Leeds. In west Yorkshire, in addition to the Wetherby bypass, we shall be publishing fresh proposals later this year for the section from

[Mr. Mitchell]

Bramham to Wetherby. I recognise the concern about conditions on the A1 south of Bramham crossroads, and we are considering it carefully.

The decision announced in the House on 6 December by my hon. Friend the former Minister of State to press ahead with A1 improvements was welcomed generally. But we also decided, following the inspector's recommendation, not to make orders for an M1 to A1 link to the east of Leeds. Therefore, a study will be carried out into the problems of through traffic in the communities in and to the east of Leeds. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State with responsibility for roads and traffic is considering the terms of reference for the study and he expects to make an announcement soon. He will also decide who will carry out the study. We fully acknowledge the need to come to a conclusion as quickly as possible about the next steps to be taken, but it is important to make a full assessment of the situation before reaching a conclusion.

Perhaps I could just assure my hon. Friend on a number of other aspects concerning trunk road schemes and studies in west Yorkshore, because other schemes are being prepared. A bypass of Drighlington is planned, and we published orders in January this year. This will provide relief to the village from heavy vehicles using the A650 to reach the M62. If a public inquiry is needed, it should be held towards the end of this year. We are also planning to provide a climbing lane on the M62 between junctions 24 and 25. The uphill gradient of this five kilometre section results in queues of slow-moving heavy goods vehicles. Our consulting engineers are now carrying out preliminary design work. We hope to start work late in 1987 or early in 1988.

My hon. Friend is now considering who should carry out two further studies in west Yorkshire. The first is on a possible link from the M1 south of Wakefield to the M62, providing an improved route for traffic from south Yorkshire to the west. The other is a study of the Wharfedale route to the A1 south. This is an important route from Leeds to the north-west. A number of bypasses have already been provided or are in the programme, but we need to decide how much more should be done.

There are also a number of smaller improvements about which I shall write to my hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend also raised certain matters concerning the Leeds/Bradford airport. Perhaps I can tell him that the White Paper "Airports Policy", published in June 1985, outlined the Government's commitment to maximise the potential of regional and local airports so that passengers with origins and destinations in the regions can use their local airports. Thriving regional airports also provide direct and indirect employment in the area, and benefit local industry by providing useful air services for business men and local air freight services. My hon. Friend particularly referred to the opportunities which he saw in connection with a postal service for the Leeds/Bradford airport.

The White Paper, "Airline Competition Policy", also made clear the Government's wish to see the new international services developed from regional airports. The Government are also active within the EEC in seeking to liberalise inter-regional air services.

The Government have also authorised unprecedented levels of capital expenditure for development. Leeds/Bradford has benefited from this. In the past four years, substantial capital expenditure allocations, totalling no less than £18 million, have been made, mainly for runway extension and its associated work, terminal extension and improvements, and so on. Phase two of the terminal extension is due to be completed this year, and approval for construction of phases three and four will be given when it is justified by the traffic growth and subject to the availability of PESC resources.

The Government's policy is to encourage the development of regional airports wherever this is justified by demand and return on capital. I hope that what I have said will give my hon. Friend some reassurance about the importance that we attach to regional airports, of which he has been supportive.

I turn now to the remarks of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bromwich, East. His usual woolly intervention, if I may say so, included an extraordinary attack on the Department of Transport for its assessment of the need for roads, and snide remarks about justifying a road even through the Sahara. I hope that those towns and villages awaiting bypasses will not fail to note the anti-road attitude of the hon. Gentleman, who represents the Labour party on the Front Bench in these matters. The hon. Gentleman referred to buses, and made what I thought were some rather cheap remarks, making play with the name of County Councillor Tweddle, who has well served the people whom he represents in his part of Yorkshire.

I am not in a position to comment in depth on the particular bus services registered as commercial because at his point we do no know precisely the extent to which the gross numbers break down compared with the existing situation. But it may interest the House to know that no fewer than 15,000 routes had been registered by 28 February as part of the commercial network nationwide.

Mr. Snape: That is a lot.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman is right. That is about three quarters of the existing system, which is much higher than his hon. Friends suggested when they spent last summer trying to oppose our legislation to improve the buses. They claimed at the time that the legislation would lead to no bus services being registered, and now there are 15,000 examples of how wrong they were. Alternatively, they said that there would be great congestion because so many buses were being registered and so many services run in our city centres.

The hon. Gentleman asked how west Yorkshire will meet the level of service within the precept limit that has been set. That is a matter for the PTE in fulfilling the policies of the west Yorkshire PTA. The extent to which they will be able to achieve that will be not insignificantly affected by the efficiency and improvement that comes about in the existing bus services in that area, which everybody knows have substantial room for improvement.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that the PTA may give a low priority to section 20 support for British Rail services. That is a matter of local priorities. It is a matter for the local authority, not the Government. If locally elected representatives responsible to local people choose to give a low priority to the section 20 arranged rail services, they must be answerable for that. Certainly there will be those who will have a good many questions to ask should they seek to regard the provision of rail services in their area as a matter of such low priority that they propose to terminate them.

I understand that the PTA is proposing to cut bus services by 10 per cent. in order to avoid the small increase in the real level of bus fares. Again, that is a matter for it to justify. I might find it extraordinary that, while the level of bus fares is substantially below that in many other parts of the country, the PTA pursues a policy of keeping bus fares at an artificially low level, having to cut the network or even raise question marks about rail service rather than increasing the price of tickets.

However, that is not a matter for me to decide. It is a matter for local people to decide through their representatives and to justify to their electorate.

Mr. Waller: Is my hon. Friend aware that the Labour-run PTA has kept fares at the same level for seven years, quite inefficiently, and that even when more money became available it used it to reduce fares in the peak periods and to make special offers to people to attract them on to buses that were already full? The same thing applies to trains. At a public meeting that I attended to discuss the train service on the Wharfedale line, it was clear that people were willing to pay more in order to keep their trains but that they were being prevented from doing so by the PTA which, instead, thought about cutting the service.

Mr. Mitchell: I do not think that there could be a more succinct summary of the extraordinary lack of reasonable priorities than has been expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley in winding up this debate.

Women Doctors (Obstetrics and Gynaecology)

5.15 am

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): It is always a pleasure to speak in this House, and never more so than at 5.15 in the morning. This debate is about the dangers to patient care caused by the way in which the medical establishment has treated Wendy Savage and Pauline Bousquet. It is Pauline Bousquet who asked me to raise this issue, because she is desperately concerned about obstetrics and gynaecological care in Hackney.

I believe that there are five main strands to the current argument, and it is important to disentangle them. First, there is the conflict between those who say that mothers should have a real say in the method of childbirth and those who argue that it is for the doctors, the experts, to decide. Secondly, there is the argument about natural childbirth versus high-tech childbirth. I believe that that argument is misleading, because there is no doubt that both Wendy Savage and Pauline Bousquet have used high-tech methods when such methods have been needed. Thirdly, there is the right of people in the medical profession to dissent from establishment views, whatever those views may be, at any particular time. Fourthly, there is the issue of the right of women doctors to participate as equals in the National Health Service and to question the chauvinism and old-fashioned attitudes of the male establishment towards its female colleagues. Finally, there is the issue of personal ambition, spite and pique, which tends to give the lie to the image created about the medical profession by "Emergency Ward 10" and similar soap operas.

I think it is disturbing that Wendy Savage and Pauline Bousquet are both women, both in trouble, both in the east end and both work in old established hospitals. We must ask ourselves whether that is just a coincidence, or whether it is a symptom of a much wider problem in the National Health Service. Wendy Savage is a senior lecturer at the London hospital. She, in effect, has been put on trial in relation to her clinical judgment in a way in which none of her male colleagues could ever have expected or would be expected to be put on trial. She has faced five weeks of hell, and she now has several months of waiting to find out whether she will get her job back. She has been the subject of the most terrible gossip and rumour, which shames the medical profession. Her trial has been manifestly unfair and manifestly unnecessary, and it is appalling that the Health Service has been made to do without her services over this recent period and dreadful that the local community, which supports her, has lost the use of her services, simply because she has radical views which she boldly states and honestly puts into practice.

The main case that I want to talk about concerns Pauline Bousquet. She is a consultant obstetrician and gynaecologist who used to work at the Mothers' hospital in Hackney. In 1975, rumours began to circulate about her ability to do her job properly. I regret to say that they were caused by her colleagues who did not like the way in which she was treating her patients. One of the things they did not like was the fact that she had long consultations with her patients. Mr. Hudson, who has recently been reappointed as a consultant at St. Bartholomew's hospital, behaved unprofessionally and introduced bad blood into the medical system. He was largely responsible for the rumours that began to circulate at the Mothers' hospital.

In 1978 Pauline Bousquet ceased to be invited to certain meetings at the hospital. She was worried about the haste which had been introduced into childbirth at that hospital. She was concerned about the use of drugs and epidurals to speed up labour, which she thought precipated in certain cases the need for caesarean operations.

In 1978 Mr. Hudson left the Mothers' hospital, but before leaving he wrote a letter complaining about Miss Bousquet's conduct. Miss Bousquet says that that letter was a load of "manifest nonsense." The medical establishment began to take some of the complaints seriously. In 1979 Dr. Murphy, the area medical officer, wrote to Miss Bousquet calling into question her professional ability. He had received complaints from Mr. Crocker, who is now a consultant at Norwich, and Mr. Glyn Evans, who is a consultant at the Mothers' hospital. The complaint about Miss Pauline Bousquet was 22 pages long and involved eight cases.

I regret to say that it looks as though, from the evidence that Miss Pauline Bousquet has given me — she has shown me all the documents, except for the names of the patients on them — that Mr. Crocker and Mr. Glyn Evans made statements in their complaints which were untrue and could not be substantiated by the medical notes. Of course, it is the medical notes that provide the main evidence in these cases. It is deeply regrettable that those two highly professional people made the same errors which could not be justified by the medical notes. That suggests that malice was involved and that it was not just a mistake. They could not have made the same errors unless one person copied from the other. They were not making the proper independent professional assessment that one would expect in such cases.

I am concerned at the fact that there may be, in the NHS, consultants who are prepared to operate in that way with respect to their colleagues. That is not the way in which professionals in any service should operate. There should be an investigation into the conduct of those two people. I ask the Under-Secretary of State to encourage the district health authority to set up such an investigation.

Pauline Bousquet asked two professors to go through the eight cases raised against her. They have done so and have concluded that her conduct could not be faulted and that the care she gave to all her patients was good.

The district health authority, especially Dr. Grant, has said that it does not question Pauline Bousquet's professional or clinical conduct. Whereas Dr. Murphy, the area medical officer at the time, was prepared to hold an inquiry into Miss Bousquet's conduct until she proved that it would be nonsense to have such an inquiry, he was not prepared to hold an inquiry into the conduct of some of her colleagues when attention was turned to their professional ability. That is worrying for the people of Hackney.

As I understand it from professional people concerned with obstetrics in Hackney, in three of the cases serious question marks were raised over the treatment received by the mothers. Those were the cases undertaken by Miss Husband and by Mr. Crocker, whom I have mentioned. However, perhaps even more important is that subsequently question marks were raised over the care given in another 11 cases, and those cases date from 1975 to 1983. The quotations that I have concerning those cases are: "babies were seriously at risk", "some appalling things were happening", and "in one case a baby died". I believe that there ought to be an inquiry into the 11 cases, and I ask the Minister to help in that. We want reassurance in Hackney for mothers in the way that they are cared for when they are pregnant.

In July 1980 Miss Bousquet gave up her emergency rota at the Mothers' hospital. She was not quite clear what was involved in giving up that emergency rota, because almost immediately a number of the consultants refused to deal with her cases and she lost them all. One result of that was that by September 1980 a rather appalling situation had arisen in Hackney.

I have a copy of the minutes of the Hackney health council at that time, and they say this in connection with the Mothers' hospital:

> "Thus only 50 per cent. of the patients were under consultant care, the remaining patients being under the care of registrars and this was very unsatisfactory."

I should like the Minister to give us an assurance that that situation will not arise again in Hackney. It is disgraceful that only 50 per cent. of the patients were then under consultant care.

To sum up my position on obstetrics, as opposed to gynaecology, I make the following requests. First, I should like an inquiry into the conduct and motivation of Mr. Hudson, Mr. Crocker and Mr. Glyn Evans. Their conduct should be examined, because it would appear that they have badly blackened the character of Miss Pauline Bousquet, and that is tragic. Secondly, I believe that there should be a clinical inquiry into the behaviour of Miss Husband and Mr. Crocker and those consultants who were concerned with the 11 cases to which I have referred. Thirdly, I ask the Minister to give us an assurance that there will not be a recurrence of the situation where 50 per cent.—or indeed any—of the mothers in Hackney find themselves without consultant care when they are expecting.

Although there is an inquiry going on at present into Miss Pauline Bousquet's case, that in no way concerns obstetrics, which is the issue about which I have been talking so far. That inquiry concerns gynaecology. Therefore, we need the inquiry for which I have called.

I should now like to discuss briefly gynaecology and the case of Miss Pauline Bousquet. Over the past few years Miss Bousquet has had most of her gynaecology work taken from her. She lost her out-patients at St. Leonard's hospital when that hospital was closed down, she subsequently lost her two clinical sessions at St. Bartholomew's hospital, and since 1984 she has not been allowed to operate at St. Bartholomew's.

There is now a curious situation, whereby this highly skilled and able consultant is employed to carry on nine gynaecology sessions a week, but in fact carries out only two of those sessions. It is absurd that the Health Service can waste talent in that fashion. It is even more absurd when one realises that Miss Bousquet has the support of the British Medical Association, local doctors, local people and the community health council.

Miss Bousquet has had strong backing from the British Medical Association, which believes that the district health authority has behaved badly towards her and breached the conditions of her contract. Mr. Peter Forster, the industrial relations officer of the BMA, wrote to Dr. Grant saying:

"As a consultant, it is essential for Miss Bousquet to maintain a close contact with her specialty and to remain abreast of all current developments which occur within her specialty, as well as the obvious need for her to practice her requisite skills. Therefore, it is, I would argue, incumbent upon the employing authority to provide her with an adequate level of work."

In other words, if the NHS gives her a contract of employment, it is no good Dr. Grant appearing on television, as he did the other night, and saying that Miss Bousquet gets paid. She does not want money for nothing. She wants to do her job. She is a highly skilled gynaecologist and should be allowed to work.

The medical establishment at Barts, as part of this long 10-year attack which has destroyed Miss Bousquet's reputation, is undoubtedly about to make this lady doctor redundant. It is all very well for Dr. Grant, whom I know and respect, to say that it is rationalising the services. It is putting this consultant out of work. The district health authority is behaving unjustly to an individual.

There is a smell of an obstetric cover-up in Hackney. The Minister should ensure that it does not take place, so that mothers can have their babies, knowing that they will receive the best treatment. Finally, patients have been denied some of the skilled and vital care that they need. It is time that the district health authority, helped by the Minister, acted on the matter.

5.31 am

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) for tabling this important debate, which raises a matter of concern to his constituents in east London, and congratulate him on having the debate selected sufficiently early for us to spend some time on it. He has dealt mainly with the case of Miss Bousquet, and I should like to talk about the background to the case of Mrs. Wendy Savage.

An inquiry has just finished and we are awaiting its decision. Both cases are about gynaecology and obstetrics, and how women wish to have babies. Should women be told, mainly by men doctors, how they should have babies, or should they be allowed more freedom? Mrs. Savage says that there is no good evidence to show that having a baby at home is more dangerous than having it in a hospital. She says that many facilities are inadequate, and that we as a nation do not use the skills of midwives sufficiently. Nevertheless, her claims and practice appear to have passed unrecognised by her colleagues, and she has been suspended and has had to go through a traumatic inquiry which will cost a large sum.

I do not have the advantage of my hon. Friend of representing the area and being conversant with the details of the cases. My opinion comes solely from reading what the responsible press has written. The legal costs were estimated at about £50,000 in November. By the end of the inquiry the press estimates that the legal costs may be £150,000.

Does the Minister think that such inquiries should be allowed to take place in the future? Mrs. Savage will be saddled with enormous legal costs, approaching £150,000, because of an inquiry into medical practice and principle. There should be a procedure for carrying out this type of inquiry without the burden of cost falling upon one person. The month-long inquiry has now finished.

The challenge was the suggestion that there was entrenched conservatism—I hasten to add with a small c — within the medical profession and that that was responsible for the poor service that many woman received in east London. Mrs. Savage criticised certain middle-aged obstetricians whose senior registrars had to cover for them because they were busy in Harley street.

The Tower Hamlets health authority cannot escape criticism for this ponderous procedure. The health authority was threatened with legal action during the inquiry by Mrs. Denise Lewis. Mrs. Lewis was one of the patients whose treatment under Mrs. Savage was used by the authority as evidence of professional incompetence. Mrs. Lewis told the authority that she had no complaints about her treatment.

It transpired that three of the five women whose cases were being used as evidence against Mrs. Savage offered to give evidence on behalf of Mrs. Savage. The cases are being considered by the inquiry and we shall be anxious to learn the outcome. One may speculate about the cases but it appears that there is division on only one case.

Other problems appear to exist in east London. In February it was reported in the newspapers that the head of obstetrics at the London hospital wished to get rid of his senior lecturer, Mrs. Wendy Savage, as soon as she was appointed head of the department. This was Professor Jurgis Grudzinskas. This has been denied by the professor, but nevertheless, there must be bad blood between the various consultants who serve in that area. This cannot be good for the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch. I hope that the Minister will endeavour to find a solution.

A team which does not work in harmony, which is more concerned with arguments against a colleague and concerned to win those arguments and appear before tribunals and courts, cannot be caring for my hon. Friend's constituents. They are not receiving the service that they expect from the National Health Service.

The inquiry heard evidence from both sides but the majority of the evidence was in defence of Mrs. Savage. She was highly commended for her handling of complicated births. Dr. John McGarry, senior consultant obstetrician at the north Devon hospital commended her. Half way through the inquiry it became clear that Mrs. Savage lost fewer babies at or just after delivery than other consultants at the London hospital. In 1984-85 her overall perinatal mortality rate was 11·3 per thousand deliveries against 13·7 for the other consultants. This is significant. I am not saying that one should therefore disregard everything else, because one has to look at the individual cases used in the tribunal to make sure that there was no gross negligence in any particular case, because if there was, action has to be taken. However, it is significant that she lost fewer babies than other consultants.

The problems were compounded by the fact that the health authority used individual case notes, and there was concern that individuals could be identified by the details given to the tribunal. This may be slightly by the way of the issue that my hon. Friend has raised, but everybody will be concerned about this, and the General Medical Council also protested about the identification of patients at the inquiry. The matter was patched up, and eventually the inquiry started again. However, there are no guidelines or rules about how individual, confidential case notes can be disclosed to public inquiries.

I am sure that if my hon. Friend had been given certain case notes, with the names removed, he would not try to discover who the people in the notes were and correlate the cases with them. However, I would not put that past certain members of society, and certain members of the press. Indeed, it could be said that the press has a duty to find out names, but it also has a duty to be responsible. It is important to make sure that confidentiality is preserved so that the press, and anybody else, no matter what their motives are, are unable to find out names relating to case notes, and the medical history of any individual person. Is the Minister satisfied that this cannot be done? If he is not, will he look into the matter, and, if necessary, issue guidance to health authorities as to how they should go about releasing confidential files, albeit without names on them?

The tribunal also heard about Mrs Savage's impossibly over-extended workload, which, it was claimed, interfered with the quality of care that she could give to cases. Professor John Dennis, the expert called in by the Tower Hamlets health authority, said that a redistribution of the workload at the London hospital "might be needed". I take it that that is a professional understatement of the case, if a man of his eminence says that, something needs to be done.

I do not want to enter into a debate about whether the NHS is properly funded—I am sure that we could debate that for many hours. However, I hope that we can agree that the demands on the NHS are always there, and new ones are always being made. The service will always be pressed because of the possibilities presented by medical advance, and it is disgraceful that Miss Bousquet, against whom no charges have been made, is not being employed to anything like full capacity. There is something wrong with the way that the Health Service is being managed in east London.

Mrs. Savage has also said that women were terrified of rumours of "knife happy" doctors. This might have been played up by the press, but that is the fear, because it is known that it is easier for doctors to perform a caesarean than to go through the problems of counselling and the more detailed and individual care that is required for natural birth. It is easy to see how such rumours can spread. In that part of London it appears to me that the consultants say, "Let's have a caesarian if there is any doubt about the birth. Whether one should take that attitude or the attitude of Mrs. Savage and Miss Bousquet is a matter of serious concern and for serious debate. It is a medical matter, and not one which should have been debated in a tribunal with a person's professional livelihood at stake. I should like to see that debate taking place in other journals such as The Lancet, and to be debated in conferences before any generally accepted decision comes out of it.

I move on now to the end of the inquiry, and I quote from The Guardian of 28 February 1986:

"A maternity unit at a leading London teaching hospital takes so long to arrange emergency deliveries by caesarian section that it should be closed, the inquiry into the conduct of Mrs. Wendy Savage was told yesterday."

"Doctors should be able to operate on urgent cases in 10 minutes but at the London Hospital's Mile End branch, where Mrs. Savage is a consultant obstetrician, there could be an hour's delay, the inquiry heard".

If one is to have a caesarian operation, one should be ready and have that operation in five, 10, 15 minutes, and not have to wait for an hour while an anaesthetist comes from down the road. If what is reported is true, the Minister cannot be happy about the operation of the National Health Service in that hospital. I hope that his Department will look at that and, if necessary, make the health authority there remedy matters.

It is clear that, if the department cannot arrange for a caesarian to be done at about 10 minutes notice, the unit should not be in business but should be closed. I do not want to see that department closed. If there is to be a unit there, it must have the proper facilities, and that means that caesarian operations ought to be available in 10 minutes if necessary.

The inquiry finished. Various professors supported Mrs. Savage. There was not very much evidence given against her, except perhaps on the one case of Mrs. A. U. Eventually it was said that Mrs. Wendy Savage's colleagues at the London hospital may have colluded to get rid of her.

This is a very difficult point. It is one to which the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch lend substance. I am of the opinion that there is a case here for the Minister to inquire into. The Minister ought to investigate what is going on in the Health Service in east London. Are there men consultants in the service who are conspiring together because they see Mrs. Savage and Miss Bousquet as irritants, as women, as people and as professionals who have a different view from theirs of how they should engage in and carry on their profession? I think the country would like to know the answer. I would like to know the answer. Is there such a plot, such a caucusing in the tea or coffee room by these men gynaecologists, because they want a nice, quiet, easy life when they do not have to think too hard about how babies should be delivered, and in what different ways they should be delivered? This may exist also in other parts of the country, but has not yet come to the surface. It is important because there is an issue of medical principle as to how we ought to run our hospitals and how much choice women should be given in having their babies delivered.

I hope that the Minister will look at these questions.

I do not intend to add anything to what my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch said about Miss Bousquet, apart from the fact that the British Medical Association rightly support her case and that general practitioners in the area very much support her case. It is a tragedy that her talents are not being used to the full. I hope that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security will look into this case and not wait until the tribunal has completed its inquiry and issued its judgment. The judgment will be issued in two parts. It will deliver judgment on individual cases of malpractice or negligence that have been brought before it. It will find either that there has been negligence or that there have been faults or that there has not been negligence or fault. The tribunal will also deal, I hope, with the general principle of how women should be treated in hospital. That is my main concern.

The Under-Secretary of State ought to consider that matter and find out what has been the role of the consultants and the health authority, and why it embarked upon this very expensive tribunal. I hope that he will publish the results of his inquiries to reassure the public that the National Health Service is acting upon principles that can be defended in public.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State ought to issue guidance about the whole problem to all health authorities, but that is a different question. We shall have to await the outcome of the inquiries that I hope he will undertake. If something has gone wrong in east London he needs to issue guidance. I hope that he will do so and look forward to what he has to say.

5.53 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): There will be some relief among my Treasury colleagues and in the City that the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) has turned his distinctive attention, at least for the moment, from their areas of concern to those of the Department of Health and Social Security, although I am not so sure that the DHSS will share their relief. It is sad, however, that the hon. Member has brought to the consideration of this question the same technique of using the privileges of this House to make personal attacks on individuals—this time individuals in the National Health Service.

I do not intend to comment on the individual case of Pauline Bousquet. An inquiry is in progress, which goes back quite a long time. I do not intend to comment on the Wendy Savage case, either. The House knows that no decision has yet been announced, and it would therefore be improper for me to comment on that case.

I was surprised that the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), who spoke from the Opposition Front Bench, felt able to comment in quite so much detail and in such a manner about that case, given the stage that that inquiry has reached. I was not quite so surprised that the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch felt that he was able to comment upon it.

Dr. Marek: I have not commented upon any private information that I may have. My comments were confined to what has appeared in the press. This inquiry is not sub judice. It is a tribunal of inquiry. I am sure that the tribunal is capable of dispassionately considering the case without being influenced by what either I or the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State will say in this debate.

Mr. Whitney: I am sure that there is no risk of the tribunal being influenced by what I shall say. I consider that it would be improper to make comments of any nature. But when the hon. Member for Wrexham reads what he has said in Hansard I think he will be surprised by how far he went in his comments.

The hon. Member for Wrexham raised the general question of this type of inquiry. It arises from procedures under what is known as HM(61)112. Action is required in serious cases which could result in dismissal. This may therefore involve setting up an independent fact finding panel of inquiry, chaired by a lawyer. The task of such a panel is to establish the facts concerned and to report to the employing authority. The panel may also, if asked to do so by the authority, make recommendations about disciplinary action to be taken against the particular doctor. That procedure has been in place for some time and hitherto has operated, as I understand it, to general satisfaction as a procedure.

The inquiry about Mrs. Savage was held in public, which is an unprecedented step for such an inquiry, and, not surprisingly perhaps, it attracted a great deal of media interest. Therefore, some issues have arisen, including the confidentiality of documents, to which the hon. Member for Wrexham referred. In the aftermath of that inquiry we shall have to take account of the implications for the future, should such eventualities arise again.

Rather than dwell further on the two cases that were raised I should like to pick up one or two general points which arose in the contributions from the hon. Gentlemen. As for natural child birth, we believe and expect that all obstetricians should take account of the preferences of women whose delivery is under their care, as far as their professional judgment allows them to go. That is a policy which we support. As the hon. Member for Wrexham said, it is a serious matter and a medical matter. I do not believe that the sex of the doctor should be important. It would be wrong to assume that only female doctors are capable of showing the sensitivity that is required.

Dr. Marek: What the Minister has just said is interesting. Would he care to comment upon whether women doctors should be available for those women who wish to be looked after only by women doctors?

Mr. Whitney: Yes, I am happy to come to that. Wherever possible we hope that that will be the case. Naturally the question of availability arises. I shall detain the House briefly so that I may set out the position as it is developing. I hope that the hon. Gentlemen will recognise that it is developing in the direction which they want because there is an increasing number of women in the medical profession and in particular in the disciplines of obstetrics and gynaecology.

We recognise the preference of many women patients, especially those from particular cultures or traditions, to be treated by women doctors. It is Government policy—and we have made this clear both to health authorities and to general practitioners — that, wherever possible, arrangements should be made for patients to be seen by a female doctor when this is requested. For example, the chief medical officer wrote only last January to general practitioners and to health authorities pointing out that many women, particularly Asian women, have deep moral or religious objections to internal examination by a male doctor. The chief medical officer asked general practitioners to respect these sensitivities and, wherever possible, to refer such women to a female consultant and to stress that the patient should be seen by the consultant herself. That answers a point made by the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch.

If health authorities and family practitioner committees are to be able to offer this choice, there must be a sufficient number of women doctors in all specialties. This is where the Department has particular responsibilities. It has been policy for many years that entry to medical school should be on the basis of ability alone, irrespective of sex. As a result, the proportion of women in the medical school intake has increased from 24 per cent. to 46 per cent. last autumn. Of course, it will take some years for that to feed through to the National Health Service. In 1985 the proportion of women among medical graduates was 41 per cent. The proportion in the most junior hospital grades was 34 per cent. The proportion in the career grades, in hospital and in general practice, was only 17 per cent. But in all grades the trend is, clearly, towards an increase both in the proportion and absolute number of women doctors.

In obstetrics and gynaecology, the focus of this debate, the trends are particularly encouraging. At present, only 12 per cent. of consultants in the specialty are women. But looking at doctors in training — consultants in the pipeline, as it were—I note that 20 per cent. of senior registrars and over 40 per cent. of registrars, excluding those overseas graduates who are unlikely to make their careers in this country, are women.

Looking even further ahead, obstetrics and gynaecology appears to be one of the most popular specialties among women medical graduates. Recent research commissioned by the Department shows that nearly half of those graduates expressing a firm preference for the specialty were women.

Moreover, we should remember that not all obstetric and gynaecological care is provided by the hospital service. General practitioners and community health doctors deal with many minor gynaecological problems and provide family planning services. GPs also take part in shared care schemes and some take complete care of women throughout their pregnancy and delivery.

I am happy to report that the number of women entering general practice is also on the increase; the proportion rose from 13 per cent. of the total in 1975 to 19 per cent. in 1985. Women also provide over 60 per cent. of the staff in the community health services. All in all, women doctors already provide a very substantial proportion of obstetric and gynaecological care in this country, and will provide even more in the future. The situation is not nearly as bad as the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch suggested in his characteristically alarmist speech.

Mr. Sedgemore: The Minister has give no reassurance about the treatment of women in Hackney in terms of obstetrics and gynaecology. He must have known, because of the number of occasions on which I have raised the matter, that it concerned Hackney. He has tried to hide behind the fact that, according to him, an inquiry is taking place. There is not an inquiry going on into obstetrics in Hackney. The inquiry is simply about the number of gynaecological sessions Miss Bousquet does. Why will he not answer the debate?

Mr. Whitney: I have made a clear statement. I will not answer individual cases, for the reasons I gave. The situation in the Health Service as a whole is healthy, as I have demonstrated. The hon. Gentleman knows well that if he has any further comments or complaints about an element of a particular health authority, he is always at liberty to approach that authority.

The red herrings that the hon. Gentleman has sought to raise tonight are unjustified. The situation of women patients and doctors, in the important disciplines of obstetrics and gynaecology, are secure and guaranteed. There is no cause for the degree of concern that the hon. Gentleman has sought to create.

British Leyland

6.3 am

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Many of the headlines in recent weeks have been about the problems facing the British Leyland operation in Britain and the allied factories and businesses which predominate throughout the country. My purpose tonight is to raise points that are worthy of close consideration because they affect the future prospects of that group of companies.

I wish, first, to examine the BL board, the body which has been charged with overseeing the development of a British-owned motor industry which fell on hard times because of many and varied problems in the late 1950s, through the 1960s and into the 1970s. Those problems stemmed from poor management control, hasty reorganisation, poor industrial relations and a failure to invest in the right product line. Above all, although its products were technically reasonable, they left a lot to be desired in terms of quality. The constant problem of underinvestment left us prey to the world car industry, especially the Japanese, and the western European industry developed its industry during the same time with the aid of investment and new factories after the war.

The BL board has tended to remain somewhat distant from the day-to-day operations of its subsidiaries. It has allowed sector managers to get on with what they know best—running a business. We understand that there is to be a change in organisation. It was recently announced that Mr. Graham Day of British Shipbuilders will take over what may be left of BL in the middle of this year. Those of us who have been privileged to meet some of the BL executives, especially Mr. Ray Horrocks, question the wisdom of changing the leadership of the board at such a difficult time. Mr. Horrocks has been primarily responsible for the development of the car side of the business. Under his directorship, Jaguar has been successfully privatised and Austin Rover has been developed from chronic financial difficulty, poor product range and awful industrial relations to acceptable financial efficiency, exemplary productivity and a very good product range.

In 1980 the car side turned in a £250 million loss. In the first six months of 1985 a small profit of some £600,000 was registered. It is too early to get information for the whole year, but it seems that the company has done a great deal better than hitherto. The present problem is a growing lack of confidence in development of the business. Rumours about a tie-up with Ford or any other company has had a dramatic effect on the company's status in the market. The car business relies on customer confidence throughout the world. Although Austin Rover has only 4 per cent. of the European market, it is able to break even, whereas Renault, with two and a half times Austin Rover's market share, turns in a loss of about £1 billion a year.

The market has been improved step by step by improving customer confidence in the company's ability to supply the right vehicles of the right quality when they are wanted. That market has been created step by step as a result of improving customer confidence in the business by supplying the right sort of vehicles, at the right quality when they are wanted by the customer. The relationship between manufacturer and customer has been built up painstakingly over the years, gaining the sort of confidence necessary to develop the market for that range of car products.

It does not take much to reduce that confidence, with a noticeable effect on the market. Commentators would not dispute the fact that since the beginning of talks about a possible Austin Rover group sell-off to Ford, or to any other company, its market share in this country dropped by about 2 per cent. in the first two months of this year. The winter months are critical for the business, and sales are hard to get. The compounded problem of lack of confidence in the business has a knock-on effect. The problems do not stem simply from reaction in the home or indeed the European market. There have been problems further overseas.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): Why does the hon. Gentleman not come straight out with it and say that the major problem facing the Austin Rover group is the Government's policy to encourage discussions with Ford? Why does he not have the courage to criticise the Government for what they are doing to Austin Rover?

Mr. King: I do not know whether I am grateful for that intervention. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman waits for a few moments, and I shall have some constructive comments to make on that issue.

The problems of Austin Rover in moving into profitability stem from its lack of across-the-range models. It is strong in the small and medium-car sector, but not in the big executive cars, which in car parlance mean big profits.

The forthcoming development with Honda of Japan of the Rover 800 series should go a long way to improve the market position and profitability of the business, nowhere more so than in the United States. There are great hopes for a high level of product acceptability. Customer acceptance at car clinics has been almost uniquely high in relation to the product on offer. It is clear that the Americans, based primarily on their knowledge of Jaguar and their growing acceptance of that company's products, are ready to buy a British executive-type car and willing to pay a premium price for it.

The structure set up there by the president of Austin Rover America, Mr. Raymond Ketchledge, is such that sales of many cars should be obtained shortly. I understand that the cars that will be available for the United States will be only 50 per cent. of what the American president of the company said he could sell and would want. The primary concern of manufacturers is to ensure that all the cars that go to the United States, although not the number required, are fit for sale in that market, and of the high quality which that market rightly demands. I am certain that the factories can produce them.

All this solid, good work will improve the fortunes of the company. There is no doubt that American dealers are increasingly concerned, after rejecting Ford or General Motors dealerships, or any sort of dealership, because they do not want that particular product, that they might be dealing with a company partly owned by Ford or some other multinational, which they would find highly unacceptable. Some of the new dealers in America are hesitant to sign on the dotted line and draw up an agreement with Austin Rover until they are satisfied beyond all shadow of doubt that they are dealing with Austin Rover and not a derivative of a multinational.

Unfortunately, the rumours continue. Although we understand that no talks are envisaged with Ford, this week's Autocar has a headline in its business section, "Ford ready to reopen Austin Rover negotiations." Bob Lutz, the chairman of Ford Europe, said that his company was still interested in owning the company and was keen to continue negotiations. Mr. Lutz is clever, because he has decided that all he must do is to say that he is interested in purchasing part or all of Austin Rover and he can suddenly knock 2 per cent. off its home market share. He can shake customer confidence in Europe and the rest of the world as a result. It is hardly coincidental that Ford seems to be doing a little better in the market after its recent outbursts about being interested in getting its hands on Austin Rover.

We must have a clear understanding of the ownership of the business and whether it will be sold to or merged with another company. For the sake of the market place, sales and jobs, such rumours must not be allowed to continue. In the midlands we look with growing horror at the hesitancy and lack of confidence of the company. We hope that, at least in the medium term, the company will be allowed to develop as it is now, seeking to collaborate with overseas manufacturers, as it is doing with Honda, Volkswagen and Peugeot, to continue producing products which are increasingly accepted, not just in the United Kingdom, but in Europe and the rest of the world.

Production at the Austin Rover plants is increasing. In 1985 about 476,000 cars and car-van derivatives were produced. Although most commentators would say that that is below the level at which the company would generate enough income finance investment, it is getting close to that level. This year, two major events should help the company to achieve production of about 550,000 units. I have already mentioned the introduction of the Rover 800 series. The other event is the joint venture with Honda to produce the Honda Ballade car on the same assembly lines at Longbridge in my constituency as the Rover 200 series. The production figures for that model are modest, but an additional 10,000 cars a year would be extremely useful, bearing in mind the fact that one need only produce them, put Honda badges on the front and let Honda sell them in the European market. Gradually, production will exceed the all-important barrier of 500,000. I hope that it will continue to increase and improve the viability of the business.

Harold Musgrove and his team have worked extremely hard. Indeed, when the story of Austin Rover is written, it will include accounts of sacrifices by employees. I have heard that employees' marriages have gone adrift as a result of the work that people have done to turn the business round. When that account is written, it will be considered a success story. Of course the Government invested a large sum in the business, but it is equally true that they receive a great deal in return through income tax paid by the workers at Austin Rover and components suppliers and through company taxation.

A primary tenet of Conservative thinking is that one must speculate to accumulate. The time is rapidly approaching when Austin Rover will be able to accumulate the income necessary to provide for new models, and for the new investment which is essential for its continued well being. Again, this would not necessarily be done by Austin Rover on its own, because that is not the way in which a car company of the standing and size of Austin Rover would develop today. It would be done in conjunction with other operators and manufacturers throughout the world, buying the best of the bits from elsewhere, producing them perhaps under licence here in its own factories, collaborating with other manufacturers in the market place, sharing its manufacturing facilities, but selling its cars through individual sales outlets. This is what Austin Rover will do with its Rover 800 in Australia, where it will be produced on Honda's assembly lines, and the Honda Ballade and the Legend, Honda's version of the 800 series, will be produced on United Kingdom assembly lines for distribution throughout Europe.

This is the way forward. It is an extremely sensible way. It is one that the company should be left to pursue on its own, so that it can develop its own future, not just in the market place, but with its own work force as well, members of which look with envy on the opportunities given to their Jaguar brethren who invested in their own business and have seen their investment grow quite staggeringly over the past four years. From those to whom I have spoken, I am certain that they would relish the opportunity in two or three years' time to take part in the ownership of the business, working together as owners and part-shareholders towards its continuing prosperity.

Mr. Ray Horrocks told one of our Back-Bench organisations the other night that he considered this a distinct possibility, that the business could be viable, working in conjuction with others, for privatisation, so as to allow the employees a share of the business. Again the question must be posed: will the market continue to have confidence in the development of that business; confidence, alas, which has been badly shaken over the past few weeks? For that the company is already paying a very heavy price. Only a firm commitment by the Government that they will continue to allow the business to develop on its own, using the management that it possesses to make the right and appropriate decisions for the various markets of the world, will allow that confidence to be restored totally so that the company can recover the market share that it has unfortunately lost in the past few weeks.

The bid by General Motors for another portion of the business—the Leyland Truck, Land Rover and Freight Rover organisation—has equally dominated the media recently. Bedford, General Motors' truck subsidiary, is as British as British can be, having been here for some 45 years or so, producing trucks. The British Army rides in its trucks now, just as Montgomery rode to El Alamein, so there is no question but that that company is a British business. Unfortunately, although General Motors has invested large sums of money in this country, these days one has to invest very large sums of money indeed to maintain a market share. General Motors' investment in Europe has largely come to be concentrated in countries like Spain and Germany, where more cars are produced than are produced in this country.

Although General Motors has, therefore, invested money in this country, it has not been enough to stem the rising tide of imports from other General Motors factories. One looks still with concern at the low British content of those Vauxhall cars that are made in this country. It is a job to justify 50 per cent. United Kingdom content in those products, even if one takes into account such things as heating and light and power in the factories that are producing them. The result of this investment policy is that Bedford has been unable to invest in a new, modern range of trucks and its market share in this country—where once upon a time it was the dominant truck manufacturer—has dwindled to no more than about 11 per cent. One can compare this with Leyland Truck, which has had an enormous amount invested in it and which last month reached 16·4 per cent. of the United Kingdom market.

Leyland Truck faces problems. It would be no good ignoring the fact that the truck market is oversaturated within western Europe, with some 40 per cent. over-capacity. Some rationalisation would be sensible, and to everyone's advantage. General Motors' approaches to Leyland Truck are sensible and make a great deal of commercial sense. The management of Leyland Truck, and possibly even the work force, but certainly the dealers who handle the vehicles, would welcome a relationship so that the two combined organisations could well command about 25 per cent. of the United Kingdom market, which would turn that business, concentrating as it would, presumably, on the Leyland Truck factory in Lancashire, into one that was rather profitable, and certainly would act as a great stepping stone to re-establishing the British truck industry in European and world markets.

It has been said by many people that General Motors is interested in Land Rover and Freight Rover because if it were to purchase Leyland Truck it would find itself in some difficulty about what to do with its vacated Dunstable assembly lines, which would obviously come to pass, because rationalisation is the name of the game and production capacity would probably have to come out from there.

It is not necessary to expand Land Rover output at Dunstable or to move the Freight Rover van factory from Washwood Heath to Dunstable to make up any shortfall. General Motors could start assembling some of the 50,000 Vauxhall Novas that are brought in from Spain every year, or, indeed, improve its United Kingdom production levels of Cavalier and Senator cars which currently come from its Belgian and German factories. There is plenty of opportunity for that company to step up its investment in car production. I suggest that it turns its attentions to finding work for the vacant factory space in Dunstable, if Bedford trucks are to be made in Leyland in Lancashire. The company should look closely at expanding car output there.

In negotiations with people such as Bob Price, the head of General Motors, one is aware of an affable and knowledgeable person who I feel sure is open to firm suggestions from the Government as to how this matter can be resolved to the satisfaction of all. If the Government were to talk meaningfully with Mr. Price and his colleagues, a satisfactory outcome for the present purchase of parts of BL could be arrived at.

I do not go along with the view that General Motors has much to offer Land Rover or Freight Rover. A massive amount of investment has been made by the BL board over the past 10 years in Land Rover production at the Solihull plant. Brand new factory space was built in the late 1970s and as a result of the closure of eight or nine satellite factories and the bringing together under one area at the Lode lane factory in Solihull, Land Rover production is now completely in house on one site and ready to exploit that advantage with better productivity and lower manufacturing costs.

Perhaps it is a bit early at this stage to reach any conclusion as to how Land Rover will develop until it has had a chance to produce vehicles for two or three years on its total site complex and we can see the sort of financial progress that the business is making. Certainly there are grounds for great optimism, after a year or so of setbacks, when the company faced real problems in overseas markets, particularly in Africa, where it was battling with the strong problems of a petro currency in Britain, which affected all exporters. That is now not quite such a disadvantage because of the falling price of oil, which has once again put manufacturing back to the forefront of our exporting achievements.

The opportunities for Land Rover, and for most of our motor industry now to get to grips with the export market, are unparalleled. The concern that we express is that we should now let those companies develop, given the challenge and the opportunities that they have, before we decide whether we want to sell them to some overseas buyer from America or anywhere else, or whether we should sell them to the employees. That would be the most sensible policy to pursue. I do not doubt that the privatisation of Land Rover, along the lines of Jaguar, could be a realistic proposal within the next two years or so, given the potential of that product and its potential in America.

Many people criticised the company for not having exploited its American potential before, but the history of Land Rover is such that it hoped it could exploit the American market. During the 1970s, British Leyland's main concern was to encourage car production for export, principally to the United States market, to tackle the problems of Jaguar. In those days the Triumph sports car, the MGB sports car and so on were exported to America and all the resources were used up on those product lines to ensure those cars reached the American market and there was nothing left for the fairly small number of Range Rovers which had been earmarked for that market. Therefore, by default Land Rover was never able to exploit that market.

One of the results of Land Rover's semi-independence to operate within the British Leyland organisation is that it has been working hard to get the Range Rover accepted in the American market. It is not just a matter of offering a vehicle to that market; it has to reach and maintain the federal emission standards, the standards of construction and so on, all of which take a considerable time to achieve.

Most people would suggest that the best way to go forward is by the use of specialised dealerships which are being set up in America. The Range Rover is a particularly expensive and exclusive vehicle, with a specialist attraction. Whether it will ever find a sensible position in the market and be sold alongside Cadillacs or Chevrolets is open to a wide degree of discussion. However, taking the advice of Porsche, which was not slow to exploit the American market, the correct way to exploit the market is to seek out specialist dealers—a handful in American terms, some 40 to 60 dealers—to major on the product concerned in a big way. That is what Jaguar is doing at the moment. Having the right investment, the right marketing factor and the right sales expertise is the way to exploit the American market. It should not be done by saturation coverage, which a tie-up with a multinational may or may not provide. Range Rovers are an exclusive British product and need to be marketed in that way. That is the way that Porsche, Mercedes, BMW, Jaguar and Rolls-Royce are seeking to exploit the American market. I think that that is the way that Land Rover ought to develop, given the opportunity so to do.

I shall deal with the problems of Freight Rover. We hear a great deal about the problems of inner city factories and the problems of holding and maintaining work within the inner city area. The Government have invested considerable sums of money, and continue to invest such money, to find work within the inner city areas not only for our young people, but for all sections of the community. An inner city factory is like a gem. It needs to be looked after and kept. It is a priceless asset. Freight Rover is such a factory in Birmingham, at Washwood Heath. It provides about 1,800 jobs for the community. Not all the workers emanate from the inner city area, but a considerable number of them do.

Freight Rover shares a factory with Austin Rover and produces the Sherpa range of light vans. It has achieved a significant place in the market, with growth of about 2·4 per cent. in a very competitive market over the past 12 months. It is a financially profitable organisation and its work force has maintained a level of productivity and dispute-free performance second to none. The workers have made particular sacrifices, as they recognise that Freight Rover is the only job they have and probably the only job they will keep, if at all possible, because of the dearth of opportunities elsewhere within the area. Therefore, we attach great importance to the maintenance of Freight Rover within the area. It is not just the provision o jobs, but the product itself. The years of development stand the test in the market place. It is a product which is wanted and which is finding growing acceptance, not just in the United Kingdom, but in the European markets.

It is not a push button, robotic factory. The vans produced are bespoke vans—built to the specifications of customers, such as the Post Office, British Telecom, the civil defence organisations and the Army. Those organisations buy a van with umpteen additions, with special brackets, special hinges, and all the rest.

I worked in the van factory with Morris Commercial before it moved to Freight Rover. A standard van used to be taken from the assembly line to a special building. Holes were drilled in the van to take special brackets and fitments and extra doors. The vehicle was then sold. The trouble is that every time a hole is drilled in a vehicle once it has left the assembly line, a rust point is made. That cannot be stopped.

The advantage of fitting the bits and pieces on the assembly line and rustproofing the whole van—Freight Rover pioneered a brand new rustproofing process, which has been copied by many other commercial vehicle producers—is that the vehicle will maintain a six or seven-year rustproof period. That is extremely desirable and acceptable to the customer and gives the company a niche in the market place which other more robotic-oriented manufacturers of vans cannot provide. Robots cannot be taught to fit a little bracket here or there—it must be done more or less by hand. That is not to say that the company is lacking in technology. It has what it describes as "islands of technology", where robots are used for the basic welding of sub-components, body sides, and so on. The labour content is somewhat higher than in comparable factories because of the product that the company seeks to provide.

[Mr. King]

There is no doubt that if General Motors were to become involved in the business it would look carefully at Freight Rover. It has told me that it very much likes the prospect of having the opportunity of selling the 3½ tonne Sherpa van, which is only two and a half years old and would fill a gap in the market for its Bedford range. However, one cannot forsee the possibility of GM making those vehicles at Washwood Heath. It makes no sense to GM to share a corner of one of Austin Rover's factories, producing vehicles in conditions which are notideal. The factory space is cramped. One will not find any plush carpets, potted palms and twinkling fountains at Freight Rover. One will find a fairly compact factory in which every square metre of space is used. That is how it should be in a successful factory. The empty space of tiled floors is not a recipe for success. One looks to see how well organised and compact a factory is. Freight Rover is certainly that.

General Motors' ownership of Freight Rover must have grave consequences. General Motors has not been able to spell out its exact future for the business, saying only that the workers there may be deployed to Land Rover production at some stage. GM has not been able to assure us categorically that jobs at Freight Rover will be maintained.

What is the possibility of a management buy-out of Land Rover and Freight Rover? We have been assured that the merchant bank Schroder Venture, has come forward with the capital. It is confident that the business, according to market and sales consultants, can and will be a viable alternative. We have been assured that it can proceed on its own, funding its own resources with the possible introduction, within two years, of extra capital through partial employee participation and in the sale of shares to raise £50 million.

The bank is confident that the business can find the funding necessary to produce new models. There is a question mark over this because Freight Rover has new models which have been developed in the past three or four years. Even GM concedes that there is no immediate intention of providing new models. Of course all companies have to develop their existing product range and refine it ever further, and Land Rover is no exception. It is certain from the statements by Schroder Venture and the management buy-out team that they can find the resources to develop the new models. Freight Rover needs £80 million to develop a new van range for its introduction in 1990-91. That might be a large sum, but we must remember that it will be spread over a five-year period. That sum of £80 million will last in product terms for more than 20 years. Unlike the car business, where the vehicles must be updated every four or five years, a van will stay in production for something like a quarter of a century. Indeed, the existing Sherpa van is a derivative of a product that first saw the light of day in 1958 and, far from being unacceptable in the market place last year, the Sherpa had a higher market share than it has enjoyed in recent times.

The van market, therefore, does not change in quite the same way as the car market. The expenditure of £80 million for a product which will have a life of some 20-25 years is, I would submit, a sensible business arrangement and a sound investment.

One must express concern, if one carefully examines the consequences of a GM buy-out, for the future opportunities for Austin Rover dealers who depend on a freight van and Land Rover products to supplement their car sales. The loss of a van range and the badging of it as a General Motors-Bedford van, as it might possibly be called, is one which would be difficult for the dealers to accept. That would reduce their profitability and open up the market again to a Japanese derivative, which would come in to take up the gap in the market place left by the Sherpa van. We are not in the business of encouraging any further Japanese imports into this country when we have our own, acceptable United Kingdom-produced products.

The future for the business as it stands is extremely good. The prospects are better now than they have been. General Motors' involvement in Leyland Truck can only be commercially sound and is welcomed generally by all those involved in the business. I would submit that GM probably needs Leyland Truck as much as Leyland Truck needs the additional market and financial investment of GM. However, when one considers Freight Rover and Land Rover, it is hard to see on balance what benefits GM can bring to those organisations. It is true that they have the investment muscle but, alas, their history in this country is such that that investment muscle has not been used in the way that it ought to have been to create the jobs and products within this country.

Although GM has invested quite a substantial sum, an awful lot has not been done by that concern. That leads one to have grave doubts about its commitment to Land Rover and Freight Rover in the future. The management buy-out scheme is ready and able to take on the challenge and I believe that it should be backed. A work force in the west midlands of some 10,000 people is employed at Land Rover and Freight Rover. It has worked incredibly hard over the past three or four years to turn these businesses round. There is not one family in Birmingham that has not been touched by unemployment, rationalisation and change. Land Rover is the only major product range that the city has to manufacture and sell and we are rightly proud of it. When we look at our colleagues at Jaguar and see the results of their work, we consider that the work that we have put in as a city, an area and as a region in turning these businesses round means that we deserve the right to participate in their future as they develop.

This Government, above all others, have concentrated on the opportunities of creating a property-owning democracy by selling council houses and, good gracious, we have sold a lot in Birmingham, Solihull and elsewhere. We should extend that property owning democracy into a business-owning democracy. The thousands of workers at Land Rover and Freight Rover — and eventually at Austin Rover — should be given the opportunity of taking their place in the sun alongside their colleagues at Jaguar and so belonging to, and owning a part of, the company, working for its viability and its future. That is an opportunity that we should not pass by.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): If the constituents of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) were to read his speech, they would be interested to see that he spent a great deal of time rehearsing some well-known facts about the motor vehicle industry but displayed very little genuine commitment and anger which faces his constituents and, in particular, those whose future is tied up in the motor vehicle industry.

The hon. Member began his speech by talking about the Austin Rover group and he said that there was a problem facing that group. He quoted Mr. Ray Horrocks about the rumours which were circulating about the group's future.

I have heard a few euphemisms in my time, but I have never heard such a gigantic one as that which describes the Government's proposals to have talks with Ford about the Austin Rover group as a rumour. It is nothing of the sort. The Government came to the House in response to a demand from the Labour Opposition, and when asked about the position, they told us that talks were going on. As a result of a campaign and debate initiated by the Labour party the Government decided in Cabinet to turn right round and abandon discussions with Ford to sell Austin Rover group.

If that is a rumour, it is rather a public rumour. The hon. Friend cannot bring himself to say that the Government were prepared to sell Austin Rover group to Ford. Was there a hint of indignation, a sentence of criticism or a word of fear about the effect of that on the hon. Gentleman's constituents in his speech? No. It was all disguised as a rumour. I am sure his constituents will understand that when it comes to a contest of loyalties between their interests and his commitment to the Government, the Government seem to win.

If there is a 2 per cent. drop in sales because of the uncertainty over the Austin Rover group, it is the Government's responsibility, because that uncertainty arises from their activities. The Minister, when replying to the debate which the Opposition initiated, said that the Government could not say, "Go away Ford." Fortunately for the United Kingdom, a few days later the Government said, "Go away Ford." It was no thanks to the hon. Member for Northfield that that was achieved.

Hon. Members who are worried about the future of BL want the Minister to tell us what is in the Government's mind. What is the timetable for the decisions? Is it correct that a decision is to be made before Easter? I was not at all clear from the hon. Gentleman's speech whether he favoured General Motors' involvement. He suggested that we should draw comfort from the fact that Mr. Bob Price is an affable man. That is a fairly irrelevant consideration when discussing the future of a British operation. I am not concerned whether a predator is affable, but whether he should be allowed to get his way. The hon. Gentleman skirted round the subject with excessive delicacy and a considerable shortage of commitment. I was left wondering what his position was. The best I could make of it was that he thought it was a good idea for General Motors to take over Leyland vehicles, but nothing else. Tht seems to be an unrealistic assessment of the position.

Perhaps the Minister can enlighten us. What is the state of play with the talks? When are they likely to be completed? We are constantly told that uncertainty is bad for industry, and I am sure that that is right. But no one has done more to cause uncertainty during the past few weeks than the Government. I should like it, if, for once, a member of the Government told us why the operation was embarked upon. Why have the Government put a "For sale" notice over BL's assets in the United Kingdom? Why are they offering for sale these vital parts of British manufacturing industry?

We know what their attitude to Austin Rover group was. The Government were willing to sell it but were stopped by the force of public opinion. Mr. Ray Horrocks had every reason to believe that he would become chairman of British Leyland, but he paid the penalty for crossing the Government and fighting the Ford proposals for he was denied the opportunity of becoming chairman.

I fiotice that the hon. Member for Northfield, although he referred occasionally in approving terms to Mr. Horrocks, did not have a word of criticism for the Government for denying Mr. Horrocks the chairmanship for which he thought he was destined. I am sure Mr. Horrocks will have occasion to reflect on fair weather friends.

The Government have to explain, much more clearly than they have done, why this exercise was carried out. The Government must have got the message that there is a wave of indignation at selling off an important part of our manufacturing sector. The Government do not look upon it as an investment. The hon. Member for Northfield considers Austin Rover a major future investment of the country. The Prime Minister is guilty of coming to the House and speaking about money invested in the British motor industry and British Leyland as if it were money that had somehow been flung away. It is money which is crucial to the future of the country. The country should stay with this investment until we get the benefits and profits that are flowing from it.

The hon. Member for Northfield initiated this debate to give the impression, especially among his constituents, that he was genuinely concerned about their interests. He has failed to carry that conviction, because he is not willing to put the interests of the Government behind those of his constituents. I have heard fewer examples, during my time in the House, of skirting around the problem than that exhibited by the hon. Member for Northfield. I hope that when the Ministery replies he is able to give us more illumination of the Government's intentions than we have had up to now.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Morrison): I shall attempt to reply to the questions put by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). I do not intend to contest many points. However, I think he was somewhat unfair to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) when he said that he failed to carry conviction.

During the past six weeks I have been more than aware that my hon. Friend has continued to put his point of view forcibly and fairly. He has brought many delegations to see me and he has talked to me about the matter. He has written on behalf of his constituents and forwarded their letters to me. I do not think that my hon. Friend could have put his case more cogently and with greater feeling with regard to Freight Rover.

My hon. Friend began his speech by discussing the Austin Rover group. My hon. Friend and the House will be aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced last month that the preliminary discussions—they were only preliminary—with Ford had been terminated. They were terminated for the simple reason that they were at the preliminary stage and as the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East pointed out that was causing uncertainty and a lack of confidence in the market place. Therefore the Government, rightly, came to the conclusion that it was best to terminate the discussions.

[Mr. Peter Morrison]

I certainly agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Northfield that the management, Mr. Horrocks, Mr. Musgrove and many others, and indeed the work force of the Austin Rover group, have done a tremendous amount to bring the company to its present standing. Collaboration with Honda and others has helped the company attain that position.

I know that my hon. Friend feels strongly about Freight Rover. He pointed out that about 1,800 jobs are involved, and that it has been successful. However, he accepted that a new range would be needed and that must be taken into account. He paid tribute to the management and the work force, as I do. He would like to build on the strong foundations, and when the Government come to make up their mind as to which way the decision will go, with the recommendation of the board, the foundations will have to be built on. I hope that we can all agree that we are talking about the future viability and competitiveness of the company. We want to see a company that can compete with, and take on, the best of the international companies in the market place. If we succeed, we shall have secured the best outlook for the work force.

The worst thing that we could do is to do nothing, because that would let the market flow by. Therefore, we must build on the foundations, and in that we have a common objective, even if we do not have a common way of reaching that objective. My hon. Friend said that the General Motors' approach to Leyland Truck was the sensible course, and he pointed to the problems that truck companies in Europe are facing. He also said that he thought that Land Rover and Range Rover had enormous potential, and I agree. If the potential is realised, there will be more jobs not only for Land Rover and Range Rover but for the supplying companies.

I should stress that, much though I would like to give an informed reply to the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East, neither the board nor the Government have made any decisions. It is difficult to give the right hon. and learned Member a timetable, because he would rightly castigate and criticise me and the Government if we were not to look closely at all available options. I agree with him and my hon. Friend that uncertainty does no good for the business, both commercially and industrially. We wish to come to a firm conclusion as soon as we can. I regret that I cannot say precisely when, but I am sure that the right hon. and learned Member will understand why.

We also have to take into account, and the right hon. and learned Member and my hon Friend referred to this, not only the supplier companies but the dealers. That is an intermingled affair, on behalf of which I have received several letters. I agree that there is a genuine need to end uncertainty. I hope that my hon. Friend, and all those involved in the Austin Rover group, will understand that a fair decision was announced in the House in February, and there is a distinction between that and Leyland Vehicles. I hope that those who are involved in the group will understand that that is the case.

European Industrial Policy

6.59 am

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): The subject I want to raise is the need for greater industrial co-operation in Europe. By Europe, I do not specifically and solely mean the European community, and when I talk of industrial co-operation I am not solely referring to ordinary industry; I wish to include the defence industries.

It is a subject to which I propose to return on future occasions because I believe that, if we can inaugurate more far-reaching and more constructive co-operation between the European countries in this field, we can go some way towards tackling the unemployment problem, which must be a matter of concern to every one of us.

Across the European Community, unemployment in the 12 member states is more than 14 million. While much of this unemployment may appear to be structural and as a result of technological change, and some of it may appear to be the result of temporary economic conditions, the fact is that, during the period that this is happening in the European Community, in the United States there has been a startling success in the creation of fresh employment so that unemployment levels in the United States remain at an acceptable level; and in what are undoubtedly our most dangerous competitors, that is to say, the industrialised countries of the Pacific basin, unemployment is at a very low level.

The inference is clear, that Europe is not taking advantage of the assets it possesses in order to strengthen its industrial base and to reduce its unemployment. It is, of course, generally known that the European Community is a long way from being even the common market, which is the most basic of its aims, further still from being any kind of an economic unit which would enable the member states composing it to take full advantage of it as a means of securing employment.

One of the points I will be urging on the Government is that they should live up to their own professions in this matter and that they really should give overriding priority to the completion of the internal market by sweeping away the barriers to trade, and particularly to trade in invisibles, which still exist.

Generally when Members of Parliament say that they conjure up a vision of obstructive Italian frontier officials, French customs arrangements at Poitiers for the import of Japanese goods and German obstructionism in the market of insurance. But there is a very large beam in our own eyes in the habits and mentalities of HM Customs and Excise which regards itself in many respects as being almost above the law. Anyone who has attempted to import anything through any of our ports will not, I think, rush to the conclusion that our customs is much more attractive in these matters than those of other countries.

I do not think that Customs is coming under a great deal of pressure from the Government to be any more easy going in these matters. Of course, we bring forward the arguments about the needs to control drugs and to control rabies, and both are perfectly valid arguments. None the less, it is difficult to avoid the suspicion that these are being used in many cases as a pretext for slowing up the inflow of goods. What is sauce for the goose has to be sauce for the gander, and if we want our goods to flow freely into Europe we must allow European goods to flow equally freely into us. The Channel Tunnel will be a step in the right direction, provided that other obstacles are not put in the way of the operation of this tunnel.

However, that is not my main point. Sweeping away obstacles to internal trade will undoubtedly assist in the development of a single market. A single market of 273 million customers must be a very powerful home base for any industry. But there is rather more to what I want to say than that. We have witnessed over a very long time span — in Britain's case probably since about 1870 — the gradual and seemingly inexorable loss of industrial supremacy.

In the 19th century the United Kingdom was the workshop of the world. Anybody abroad would buy almost anything that was made in Britain, precisely because it was made in Britain. That position has been eroded over the years. Two world wars have wrought their toll. We have gradually seen what were once undisputed British industrial supremacies disappear down the plug hole. Wht happened to the great British motor cycle industry which at one stage was almost the sole motor cycle industry in the world? Little by little we have seen such industries disappear.

We are at a particularly dramatic moment in this process of disappearance, with the future of British Leyland very much on our minds. I do not intend to say very much about British Leyland, because there has been a debate on that subject. However, when it became apparent that British Leyland would have great difficulty in surviving as a mass car producer because it is very much smaller that any of its competitors two possibilities opened up for it. One was that it should be taken over by General Motors. The other possibility — the one that is being very much trumpeted by my hon. Friends with constituencies in the Midlands and by the Opposition — was that there should be a purely British rescue operation. Neither of these possibilities meets the bill. I accept that the American takeover makes some kind of economic sense, but an American takeover would represent a very large step towards the abandonment of a true, native-based industry. The British solution would lead us back, I fear, to the time when British Leyland was a permament pensioner of the British state.

It is probably too late now for the third and, to my mind, the right alternative. Before we ever got to where we are, there ought to have been in existence the possibility of a partnership between British Leyland and one of the European manufacturers. It need not necessarily have been one of the EEC manufacturers. It could have been Volvo. That would have complemented BL's capacities in such a way as to produce a viable firm that would have been multi-centred and whose ownership would have been basically European. If British Leyland had joined up with one of the German or Italian manufacturers, it might have contained a very large American element. I am not arguing in favour of a policy that would try to shut out the Americans. However, I am arguing that we should seek to have a policy that includes, wherever appropriate, a very substantial European element.

The same set of arguments apply to Westland. My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) made a valiant and ultimately unsuccessful effort to mount a European rescue effort for Westland. Once again it was too late, not due to any culpability of Her Majesty's Government but largely because such "rescue" as loomed up over the horizon from Europe looked more like an attempt by the European manufacturers to snuff out Westland as a possible competitor. The faults are not on our side alone. But when we add them all together we get a failure both by Her Majesty's Government and by the Governments of the European countries to make any use of the Community as an institution to exert its influence as a powerful trading bloc to sustain its own industry.

The argument will present itself in another particularly acute form over the future of the European airbus family of aircraft. I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for the City of Chester (Mr. P. Morrison) is not answering the debate, because he has a particular interest in the project. The airbus has been a tremendous success technically. Of course, it is far too soon to prophesy whether the Government, or those who put their money into the project, will make a profit.

We have the siren voice of that once sensible publication, The Economist, urging strongly that the British aircraft industry should surrender without a fight to the Americans and that we should allow all major civil aircraft to be built in the United States, leaving it to Boeing and McDonnell-Douglas to fight it out between them. That is a craven act of folly when the possibility exists of maintaining a capacity in Europe to produce not just an aircraft but a whole family of aircraft capable of meeting the demands of the world market at almost every level. I earnestly pray that the Government will listen not to The Economist but to those Ministers, of whom I am sure my hon. Friend is one, who will urge the vital importance of maintaining a capacity for the construction of civil aircraft in Europe. Here at least is one industry in which we for the moment are not faced with knock-out competition from the Pacific basin and where we should be unwise in the extreme to surrender all our advantage.

That leads me to public procurement, which involves not only Governments but also governmental agencies. One sometimes has the impression that European airlines in all too many cases deliberately operate a "buy American" policy. If the airlines operated a European preference when they make purchases of civil aircraft, that might in itself suffice to sustain a European civil aircraft manufacturing capacity.

The record on public procurement is frighteningly dismal. In 1982, the last year for which figures are available, in all its public purchasing the United Kingdom spent no less than 98·3 per cent. of Government cash on equipment made within our own borders. That left 1·7 per cent. with which to encourage joint ventures overseas. Though a dismal record, it is better than the Germans, who left not 1·7 but 0·3 per cent. for joint ventures; or the French, who left the enormous total of 0·09 per cent., or the Italians, who left nil per cent. of public expenditure to be spent outside their own borders.

This reflects the enormous public political pressure in favour of a buy native policy, and one need sit in this House for only a few hours to hear it, and understandable it is. Obviously, every hon. Member will urge as strongly as possible the arguments in favour of spending public money in his constituency. I remember fighting hard for the retention, for example, of steel-making at Shotton. From a constituency point of view, that was an unanswerable case. Nevertheless, there was a national case which required that steel-making capacity should be concentrated in those areas where there was a natural case for having steel-making, and Shotton was not one of them. I was, rightly, overruled in that instance.

Whey we talk about the car, helicopter or machine tool industries, two sets of arguments operate at a political level. There is a powerful economic argument which says, "Let us go for the most immediately profitable solution which will bring the best return to the shareholders and give the workers in the industry the best guarantee of maintaining their jobs." That argument often operates in favour of an American, Japanese or even an Arab takeover.

The other argument, deployed by Back Benchers on both sides of the House, says, "The best way to do it is to use public money to maintain a buy British policy, a subsidy, a purely British solution." There will always be those who will argue for a national solution for whatever industry comes into the public domain of discussion.

What never operates is pressure to say, "Let us look for a solution which takes advantage of our membership of the European Community" or, at a lower level, "which takes advantage of our proximity to Europe — be it Switzerland or Sweden — which will enable us to construct an alternative future for this industry or firm and which may, in the short run, not offer the same advantages to the shareholders."

It may not even offer the same security of employment to its workers, but it may offer long-term possibilities for industry and for the future of employment in Britain. That may not be available through a purely British solution entailing a permanent subsidy, or through an American solution involving a total takeover, with the risk that, when the chill winds blow, the Americans will close down their out-stations, as it were, and concentrate production at home — after all, they are subject to the same pressures—to safeguard jobs in their country.

There are no democratic pressures on the Government to exploit to the full our membership of the European Community to ensure the prosperity of British firms and safeguard British jobs. The pressures are all against such solutions. It is for the Government to see matters as a whole and to make the maximum use of our membership of the Community to achieve our objectives. There should be much faster progress of the consolidation of the internal market. A substantial step forward could be achieved by stabilising the exchange rate through the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system. All of these matters are major policy decisions which can be achieved only in concert with our European allies. I know how difficult that is until we have a much improved decision-making process in the EC, which means moving away from the veto, but I shall not go into that.

There should be a Minister responsible for co-ordinating procurement and industrial policies to ensure that, whenever a controversial decision comes up, full weight is given to the European alternative. Several Departments are involved in that. The Department of Trade and Industry is one and the Ministry of Defence is another. Perhaps I should have enlarged on what is happening in the arms industry. Each country, by drawing a narrow specification of its requirements, has made it virtually impossible to achieve European co-operation. The result is that, one after another, we are equipping ourselves with expensive weapons which are unsuitable for use by our allies. This is a NATO matter — the NATO group in Europe is not maximising the opportunities. The Department of Transport has a critical role to play, and the Treasury is also involved in matters such as I have mentioned.

If, in Cabinet, there was a Minister who could say, "Wait a minute. There may be a better but not so immediately attractive European alternative" we could achieve much more in the Community and in the European part of NATO to sustain jobs and preserve industries which otherwise face a pretty grim future.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) for bringing this subject to the attention of the House. Many of my colleagues have observed his healthy fixation with this matter. He is motivated purely by a desire to help Europe produce a truly common market against which our industrial companies can make their marketing plans and, we hope, go on to achieve success on a world scale having taken advantage of that large and burgeoning market.

My hon. Friend has asked two key questions—does Europe face an industrial problem and, if so, what can Governments do to tackle it, acting together in the European Community? In other words, do we need a European industrial policy and, if so, what sort of policy should it be?

I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that there is a problem—a problem for Europe as a whole as well as for us in Britain. It is a problem of competitiveness: the global competitiveness of some sectors of European industry. It is manifest in the painful process of adjustment that has been necessary in our industrial structures, which is not yet complete. It is manifest equally in Europe's relative weakness compared to the United States and Japan. Success is crucial in the new technologies if we are to create the wealth and jobs that our societies need.

The symptoms are well known. The European Community's share of export markets in some fast-growing sectors has declined. Between 1973 and 1983, for example, the European Commission has estimated that the Community's share of export markets in electrical and electronic products declined by just under 2 per cent., while the United States and Japanese shares in the same sectors increased.

Import penetration in similar sectors has increased faster in the Community market than in the markets of its major competitors. In information technology and electronics, for example, it has been estimated that penetration rates between 1973 and 1982 rose from 10 per cent. to 17 per cent. in the EEC; from around 6 per cent. to around 10 per cent. in the United States; and from around 4 per cent. to around 5 per cent. in Japan. Europe has been less successful than either the United States or Japan in creating new jobs. Since 1972, an additional 19 million jobs have been created in the United States and 5 million in Japan. In Europe as a whole, with a much larger overall population, employment levels have remained virtually static.

What, then, can Governments usefully do to strengthen Europe's industrial capability? Two strategies are sometimes suggested which would clearly not help — indeed, they would make matters worse. One is a strategy of generalised protection: Fortress Europe. The other is a strategy of generalised state subsidy and state intervention. Both would be costly to consumers and taxpayers. Both would be anti-competitive, distort the market and blunt the edge of the primary stimulus to commercial success. For these reasons, neither strategy would ultimately work.

As I see it, an effective European industrial policy must have three basic objectives. First, it must open up the internal Community market, making a reality of the single, integrated market envisaged in the treaty of Rome. It must improve the climate for enterprise in Europe, not least by tackling regulatory burdens on business. It must encourage closer market-led collaboration between European businesses, above all in advanced technology.

The first of those objectives is fundamental. The sheer size of their home markets and the economies of scale that they afford offer American and Japanese industry a major competitive advantage. The creation of a similarly integrated domestic market for European business is perhaps the most important single step we can take to strengthen Europe's industrial performance.

The goal is a genuine European market of 320 million customers, matching the 230 million customers in the domestic market of the United States and the 120 million in the domestic market of Japan. The European Community has been working towards this goal for nearly 30 years. It still eludes us. True, tariff barriers and quotas have been effectively eliminated in intra-Community trade. But the free movement of goods throughout the Community is still obstructed by "non-tariff" barriers, such as frontier formalities and differing national product standards.

Similarly, the growth of a free and competitive market for services, particularly in sectors such as financial services and transport, which provide essential service infrastructure for manufacturing, is blocked by a range of restrictions in many member states. The efficient functioning of the European market as a whole is distorted by the protective use of public purchasing and other public sector aids. There is a new determination in Europe to tackle these problems. Last June, the European Council at Milan endorsed the broad thrust of an important White Paper from the Commission that set out a detailed plan for action required to complete the internal Community market by 1992.

Mr. Speaker, it may be because of the early hour, but it is interesting to note that in the copy of my speech, the word "internal" looks disconcertingly like the word "infernal". It may be something to do with the typewriter.

The United Kingdom and the Netherlands, as the two countries occupying the Community presidency this year, have produced jointly the action programme targeting more than 100 issues for decision by the end of 1986. It will be a central aim of our presidency, in the second half of the year, to maintain maximum impetus behind that programme.

A second aim of European industrial policy should be to improve the framework within which industry operates. That is partly a matter of action at national level on a wide variety of fronts. We in Britain are increasingly aware of the need to promote more positive attitudes to industry and to wealth creation; to make our education system more responsive to industrial needs; and to cut the burden of regulation on business. They are priority concerns for many of our Community partners, too.

The third objective that I identified was to promote European business collaboration in advanced technology. In telecommunications, for example, about 15 European companies are competing for a share of the European market — as compared with the four or five giant American firms which dominate the United States market. The pattern is much the same in other growth sectors. Collaboration within an increasingly integrated European market is inevitable if a competitive European presence in those sectors is to survive.

Collaboration in reserch and development—spreading risks, spreading costs and exploiting the strength of pooled resources—is one major way forward. The Community has developed some important support schemes to encourage collaborative R and D at the so-called "pre-competitive" stage. The ESPRIT programme, for example, which is focused on information technology and complementing our Alvey programme, is starting to gather pace. We have the BRITE programme for industrial technology, and RACE for broad-band communications.

Such programmes reflect a welcome shift of emphasis in Community-funded research. They are directly relevant to industrial needs. They use Community money — public money — to stimulate spending by business. In discussions which are starting in Brussels on a new framework programme for Community R and D in the five years 1987-91 we are determined to encourage this trend towards market-oriented, cost-effective effort.

But action at Community level is not the end of the story. Industrial collaboration in Europe can often usefully extend beyond the 12 member states. The aim must be to develop specific products or services which will be competitive on world markets. Both those elements are central to the EUREKA initiative. EUREKA is giving major impetus to European collaboration in new technology. Eighteen European countries are involved. More than 20 collaborative projects are already at an advanced stage, and British firms are participating in six of them. They are actively pursuing proposals in many other areas. We are currently hosting and chairing the EUREKA discussions. It is fair to say that our thinking has made a major contribution to the shape of the initiative, following its successful launch by President Mitterrand last year.

EUREKA is not, and could not sensibly become, a new financing mechanism. Finance for EUREKA projects is a matter for the participating firms, with support where appropriate from their national Governments under national schemes. I should add in this connection that British firms participating in worthwhile EUREKA projects can qualify for assistance under our existing R and D support schemes.

EUREKA offers two important advantages to industry. First, it will wire British and other European firms into a Europe-wide network for the exchange of information on new collaborative proposals and opportunities. Secondly, and even more important, it will provide a framework in which business and Governments can identify, and put new momentum behind, concrete action in the Community and elsewhere, to open the European market for the benefit of the projects concerned. There could be action, for example, to generate new European technical standards or to liberalise public sector purchasing.

I have outlined what, as we see it, is a co-ordinated European industrial policy and what it can sensibly seek to achieve. I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that no industrial policy vacuum in Europe is crying out to be filled. The reality, rather, is that the Community as a whole is already acting in the areas I have described to strengthen Europe's industrial base. Progress in those areas is essential for the health and competitiveness of industry in Britain and in other member states. We are throwing our full weight behind the initiatives in hand.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West for bringing this matter to the attention of the House. I noted his endorsement of the need for what he called a Minister responsible for co-ordinating procurement and industrial policies generally, and his suggestion that full weight be given to the European alternative. No doubt those words, which are now on the record, will be noted in the appropriate quarter. In the interests of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike), who, with great professionalism, has decided to launch his debate at 7.34 am, and those of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, the best thing that I can do now is to thank my hon. Friend once again and to wish you, Mr. Speaker, a very good morning.

Hospital and Ambulance Services

7.35 am

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I intend to change slightly the content of my speech because of the time of the morning; I wish to give the Minister an opportunity to reply to the debate. Although I had intended to refer in some detail to other parts, I shall restrict my comments to my own constituency and to my own area of the Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale district health authority; concentrating on the problems of hospital closures and reductions in the ambulance service caused by Health Service cuts in that area. This, of course, does not mean that I have failed to recognise that these problems affect the whole country, as all parts have been forced to cut services because of Government restrictions of the finance available for the Health Service.

In my own constituency it was recently announced that two hospitals are to close, Marsden hospital and Bank Hall hospital. It was originally envisaged that the role of both these hospitals would change because of developments taking place at Burnley general hospital. When the 10-year plan for the district health authority was introduced, I welcomed the developments that were taking place at Burnley general hospital and never for one moment imagined that the two hospitals which are due to close would keep their current format.

Having said that, however, until it can be shown that in the area that I represent and in the country as a whole we have eliminated the long lists of people waiting for medical and surgical treatment, and have provided all the necessary geriatric accommodation, I cannot support the closure of a single hospital, and I think that the step that we are taking is a retrograde one. This is especially so in an area like mine, based on the two traditional industries of coalmining, now completely gone, and textiles, both of which give rise to health problems for those working in them, particularly chest problems. Many have underestimated the effect of cotton dust in the air and of the artificially damp atmosphere that was created for the benefit of the cotton rather than that of the people working in the industry. So we have many people with chest problems, and a corresponding need for accommodation and facilities to deal with them. In addition, areas such as north-east Lancashire and Burnley, in particular, have a growing number of elderly people; we certainly need much more geriatric accommodation.

A big campaign is already being mounted by the borough council, the Labour party and the trades council, to fight to save the hospitals and to provide the Health Service facilities that we believe the people of our towns are entitled to. We shall be supporting the prospective candidates in Pendle, Sylvia Renilson, and in Rossendale, Janet Anderson, and the many people who are fighting to preserve the hospitals due for closure, and opposing the cut-backs in the hospital services in their areas. Indeed, the Pendle borough council, which has no overall political control—Labour controls the largest party but does not have overall control—is mounting a massive campaign with all-party support to save the Hartley hospital. When I am arguing for the two hospitals in Burnley—Marsden and Bank Hall—I am not arguing for them at the expense of either Pendle or Rossendale. I would not wish to see Marsden or Bank Hall saved at the cost of losing one in Pendle or Rossendale.

The Minister should look at the medical report of the district medical officer, Dr. Grime, which shows clearly that there is a great demand for more resources for the Health Service, rather than less, in north-east Lancashire in the Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale health authority.

The closures are clearly being made to save money—£1·5 million. But when I returned to my constituency yesterday, I was informed that at the meeting of the district health authority, held only the previous night, cuts of a further £1 million had been requested and further drastic action had to be considered.

It must be said that even moderate people on that committee—Mr. Ashworth, who is a registrar at the county court—were talking of allowing the Government to call in the commissioners to do the dirty work because enough was enough and further cuts could not be countenanced.

Even Muriel Jobling, the chairman of the district health authority, because she has tried to resist some of the proposals—and I do not know her political party—and has not toed the Government line, has had it suggested to her by the chairman of the regional health authority that she might say that she did not want to seek another term as chairman of the district health authority. She did not choose to do that and so she has been told that she is not being reappointed. Yet she has fought to try to preserve the Health Service for the community. The protest of people from all political parties and all parts of the Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale district health auhority has shown the amazed outrage at the decision that she should not be reappointed.

The second aspect of the debate is the restriction of ambulance services and the cutting of that service within Lancashire. That is causing people throughout Lancashire grave concern. Indeed the Burnley Express and News and in particular the Lancashire Evening Telegraph have run a big campaign attacking the new proposals and policy changes that were introduced on 6 January when a quota system was introduced to try to avoid an overspend.

A letter from the Lancashire family practitioner committee dated 4 February to the regional general manager of the North-Western regional health authority said that it had considered a report at its committee meeting on 29 January on the current situation in the Lancashire ambulance service. The letter went on to express the concern of general practitioners at the effects of the introduction on 6 January, without prior notice, of a quota system for outpatients as a result of an anticipated overspend of £250,000 in the current financial year by the Preston health authority, the managing body for ambulances for the seven Lancashire districts. Preston health authority has, on a number of occasions, sought additional resources from the regional health authority to offset the continued effects of repeated efficiency savings and cost improvement programmes. The Lancashire family practitioner committee registered its gravest concern at the present situation and rejected completely the interim solutions which had been introduced. It called on the regional health authority to provide further resources to cover the projected overspending until the results of the review of Lancashire ambulance services, which has been commissioned by the regional health authority, are available. Similar views have been expressed by Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale community health council. It wrote to Preston district health authority on 11 February and sent a copy to the hon. Members representing the three constituencies within its area. It expressed concern at the authority's failure to consult the community health council regarding what it viewed as a "substantial variation in service" and concern at the distress caused to patients by this action. The letter said:

"my members are amazed to have read a statement in the press from yourself and officers that as a consequence of reducing the workload in regard to transporting out-patients to hospital by some 35 per cent., some inconvenience will be caused to patients."

That view was being expressed to the chairman of the Preston district health authority.

The letter attaches a schedule of cases where seriously ill patients have failed to keep their out-patient appointments. It is a long list and it is being added to all the time. It gives an example of a 43-year-old lady who was thought by her general practitioner to have suffered a stroke. She was refusd an ambulance by control staff because the daily quota had been reached, despite the fact that she needed to attend the hospital x-ray department for a brain scan. It was eventually discovered that the lady had a brain tumour. I can give many examples, but time is short. It is a nonsense to run an ambulance service on a quota system which says that if the quota is used up during the first three days of the week no ambulances will be available on the next two days. As I have said, I have a long list and if the Minister wishes to look at it I will provide him with a copy.

The change has also resulted in wasting the time of professional Health Service personnel, particularly physiotherapists. It has increased the work load for hospital administrators, who are now continually having to change patients' appointments because the quota system means that patients cannot attend on the date or time for which the appointment was originally made. Disruption has been caused to the work of outpatient clinics. Ambulance men allege that the time and capacity of ambulances has been wasted because they do not always carry a full load and additional spaces have been available. There was a manpower shortage in 1984 and at that time transport was hired and hospital car volunteer drivers were used, mainly for day care cases, at a cost of £300,000.

Finally, because I want to allow time for the Minister to reply, I want to deal with the important aspect of people who have had their training blocked and are not being allowed to do emergency work or anything else, or complete their training in the ambulance service. That is a matter of great concern. As I understand it, the reason for that is to save money. Once people are fully trained they will have to be paid slightly more. I know that the National Union of Public Employees is taking legal advice on that and is fighting on behalf of its members and is trying to ensure that they are able to provide the services necessary for running outpatient and emergeny services.

It has to be said that emergency services have now been so cut to the bone that in times of major emergency, or two incidents happening at the same time during certain stages of the night, ambulances would not be able to provide the much-needed service to the people of North-east Lancashire. These issues, at this early hour of the morning, are crucial to the people of north-east Lancashire, Burnley and Lancashire as a whole. I believe that the cases I have illustrated are examples of what is going on, not only in my part of the country but throughout the length and breadth of this country because of the cuts being imposed by the Government.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I congratulate the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) on bringing to the attention of the House this important and serious aspect of deficiencies in the National Health Service faced by his constituents.

I hope that we do not hear the usual Government claptrap from the Under-Secretary of State about expenditure on the NHS increasing by 18, 20 or 22 per cent. The Government use a convenient starting date—1979, rather than a little later, which gives a different figure. They are selective about the way they use figures. They conveniently forget about demographic change. The population is aging.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): What a lot of claptrap.

Dr. Marek: The Government forgot about that. It is a lot of claptrap. We are getting more older people. The Under-Secretary of State may laugh, but that is a serious reason why there should be real growth in the NHS. The Government compare growth in the NHS with the retail price index, but they do not compare it with a medical index. We all know that the costs of medical equipment have increased much more than the retail price index has increased.

The Government do not take into account medical advances which mean that much more complicated pieces of apparatus are available to cure diseases and treat ailments than were available just five years ago. Now that is run of the mill equipment. The Government simply say, "The NHS is looked after. There has been growth." If they took account of those factors, they could not make such statements.

We all know about the massive increase in unemployment. Unemployment affects health, and the nation is not as healthy as it was. This places increased demands on the Health Service. The Government do not take that factor into account. If all those points had been taken into account, the Government's statement about real growth in the NHS would be seen by everyone to be nothing but claptrap.

The front page of today's Labour Weekly states:

"MPs' hospital to close.

A central London hospital is to close down for a month in order to meet government health cuts.

The hospital — St. Thomas's — is directly opposite the House of Commons and is frequently used by MPs.

The West Lambeth District Health Authority, in order to cope with health cuts, faced a difficult choice.

A paper from the administration suggested giving over more beds to private health".

That is another sad aspect of what has been happening under the Government. They have been putting in their own people, trying to privatise the NHS. The article continues:

"the authority rejected the proposal. The chair then resigned" —[Interruption.]

I wish that the Under-Secretary of State and the Whip would stop twittering from a sedentary position. I shall take one more minute, and then the Under-Secretary of State can have seven. The article states:

"no treatment in August, except of emergency cases."

That means that about 1,000 people will not be given treatment, waiting lists will lengthen and hospital workers and doctors will try to find hospital beds in other parts of London.

What does that have to do with the efficiency about which the Government talk so often and for so long? What efficiency? What a way to run the National Health Service.

7.53 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): With permission, I shall intervene for the third time in tonight's debate. The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) implied that he was averse to claptrap, yet he gave us several minutes of claptrap, reinforcing the claptrap from the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) about the alleged cuts in the Health Service. It is therefore necessary to repeat that, in real terms, there has been a 21 per cent. increase in spending. There has been an increase in capital spending from £365 million in 1978-79 to £900 million next year. More details on that fact, and not claptrap, will be given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in tomorrow morning's debate—I suppose that technically it will be tomorrow—on the impact of the Griffiths' report.

I commend the hon. Member for Wrexham for staying in the Chamber and listening to me, and so improve his knowledge of the Health Service. He clearly needs to learn more about that.

The region represented by the hon. Member for Burnley is a significant RAWP gainer and has gained 11·7 per cent. in real terms since the Government came to office. There is an important story to tell about capital spending. The hon. Gentleman talked about hospitals. The north-west region has the largest capital programme in England, involving about 10 per cent. of total capital spending. There are new hospital developments throughout the region in a massive programme, in Preston, Salford, Bury, Wigan, Central Manchester, Blackpool, Wyre and Fylde; and in Blackburn, Hyndburn and the Ribble Valley. That is a picture of which we should all be proud—including the hon. Member for Burnley when he stops trying to make party political points.

I was glad to note that the hon. Member for Burnley welcomed the commissioning of the new Burnley general hospital, an impressive project which will benefit his constituents. The authority and the Health Service are proud of that hospital. It has, however, had implications for the other local hospitals to which the hon. Gentleman referred and in particular for the Hartley hospital. However, the local health authority has to make proper use of its resources, taking account of the demands on it. Should it come to a decision at the end of the day for a permanent closure—and I can make no comment on that — the decision would be subject to the usual processes of consultation, of which I am sure the hon. Gentleman is aware. If it is opposed by the community health council, for example, it would come to Ministers for a final decision. Only at that point would it be appropriate for my right hon. and hon. Friends to take a decision on the matter.

I must emphasise that redeployment of resources stems from the fact that the hon. Member for Burnley's constituents are to enjoy the services of the new development at Burnley general hospital. Instead of proposing that as a cut, he should take account of the development of services to which I have referred.

The ambulance service in Burnley, which is run on behalf of the Burnley health authority by the Preston health authority, has been overspending its cash limits. The ambulance service is a growing demand service in that it faces growing demands and receives growing resources. That service must be run under some financial discipline.

The quota system to which the hon. Member for Burnley referred is for non-emergency services. I understand that arrangements are made that, whenever there is a case of urgent medical need, it has been met. There is no question that the routine arrangments of the non emergency services are set aside in cases of particular emergencies. Obviously, I cannot comment in more detail on the detailed cases to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I take note of his points and I have no doubt that the chairman of the district health authority will consult and take note and if necessary either I or the district health authority chairman will write to the hon. Gentleman.

The point I must emphasise and of which I expect the hon. Gentleman to take account is that these growing resources are available to the region and to the hon. Gentleman's health authority. It is pointless for the hon. Member for Wrexham to continue to use his favourite word "claptrap". The fact is that the resources are growing.

Taxpayer's resources spent on the constituents of the hon. Member for Burnley are growing in real terms. Many of those resources are devoted to the provision of appropriate sevices, which must be run under reasonable financial disciplines and limits. That has been put into action.

The emergency medical cover is not affected. If individual cases go wrong, we shall be prepared to take them up, and, as the hon. Gentleman knows, he has the right to take individual cases up directly with the health authority.

It being 8 o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question being put, pursuant to Standing Order. No. 113(2).

National Health Service (Pay)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

8 am

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): It is interesting that today we are having a number of debates on the National Health Service. That reflects the great public disquiet about its administration and the appallingly low levels of pay. I wish to draw attention to that issue.

First, I say with pride, not by way of apology, that I am sponsored by the National Union of Public Employees, and it is right and proper that that should be on the record. I was formerly a full-time official of that union, working in the NHS, and at one stage I was a member of an area health authority, so I have some experience of NHS matters.

There is grave disquiet within the NHS about the way in which staff are treated. During the past five years NHS workers have suffered from the threat of privatisation, which essentially means that many ancillary staff are being asked to offer their job on an annual or biennial basis to the lowest bidder, as a series of contract cleaning and catering companies line up to take the pickings from the NHS. That has resulted in job losses and a reduction in the real wage levels of many workers, and has created a climate of fear and intimidation. I hope that the Minister will try to understand what it is like to be a hospital cleaner, knowing that one's job is with a contract cleaning company, whose bid the following year may not be successful, and that a new contractor may pay even lower wages or not offer one a job. A series of hired hands are moved from one contract cleaning company to another.

Other groups and grades feel equally worried. It started with cleaners, moved to catering staff, and may move to building staff, the various maintenance and gardening grades and right up the scale. The NHS has a major function to play, and we could and should be proud of it. It is no way to treat employees every year to offer their jobs for sale to contractors. If it can be done for cleaners and catering grades, clearly it can be done for many other grades. A number of technical and professional grades already feel the cold wind of privatisation.

Late last year, as in the previous year, the Department of Health and Social Security produced a glossy book called:

"The Health Service in England".

It is designed to make us believe that the NHS is doing particularly well. Table 19 on page 43 deals with Health Service employed staff by main staff group for England, and shows that nursing and midwifery staff increased from 351,000 to 397,000—an increase of 13·2 per cent.—and lists other grades showing increases in staffing levels.

I am particularly interested in the treatment of ancillary staff. Their numbers have decreased from 172,200 to 152,200, which is an 11·6 per cent. reduction over six years. That reduction appears to be continuing. The ancillary grades are not only the lowest paid in the National Health Service but are suffering the largest number of job losses.

On page 46, appendix C shows Health Service expenditure on staffing, goods and services broken down into salaries and wages and supply and maintenance. Within the section on salaries and wages is shown the proportion of total wage expenditure that goes on nurses and midwives—44·5 per cent.—and on ancillary staff—15·3 per cent.—medical and dental 13·7 per cent. and so on. However at the end as a tiny footnote there is "Chairmen's remuneration 0·03 per cent." There are not many chairmen in the health authorities, but together they managed to collect £1·7 million in chairmen's remuneration. When one compares that with the average wages of an ancillary worker one begins to understand the issues I am concerned with. At one end of the scale in the National Health Service we have the doctors' remuneration at £21,000 a year. However, they are in dispute, as consultants get far more than that. There is also the absolute scandal and disgrace of the ludicrous merit award system, which operates for consultants. Essentially, consultants nominate each other for merit awards, it is done in secret, and the public pick up the bill without having any say in the levels of merits awards that are made to those people. I believe that the last figure quoted was something like £20 million being handed out to themselves in merit awards.

I am not saying that the doctors, consultants or surgeons do not do a valuable job. One could not run a health service without them. However, I am sure that most of those people would agree, that neither can one run a health service without cleaners, caterers and portering staff. It is a team approach that is adopted in the hospitals and I wish that the Government would understand that with regard to pay. My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) spoke in the previous debate about job losses and cuts within the National Health Service. He mentioned the temporary closure of St. Thomas's hospital and the threat to Westminster hospital. Yesterday there was an announcement in a local paper of job losses at St. Nicholas's hospital in south-east London.

The closure of the Dreadnought seamen's hospital resulted in yesterday's strike of cross-channel operators because they are not prepared to see their hospital close. That is the degree of the frustration and anger that exists among the supporters of the National Health Service, never mind those who are within the Health Service.

I wish to put specific questions to the Government regarding pay. The pay for nurses and midwives has been in the public eye recently and is a matter of public conern. The cause of the concern is the pay gap between nurses and other grades and the way the award was funded. Health Service workers are not prepared to go on being told that they can agree a pay level—an agreed national level—through negotiations and then be told by the Government that the Government are not prepared to pay that award in its entirety, instead passing part of the cost of the award over to the local district health authority. That is specifically intended to create an atmosphere wherein, if the health workers accept lower wage rates, there will be more money spent on patient care. We know that this is not the case. It is a cynical manipulation of the way that negotiations should be conducted within the National Health Service.

I wish to quote from the evidence submitted by my union, the National Union of Public Employees, in its pay review body document 1986 for nurses, midwives, and health visitors.

"There is still a large pay gap. When we compare current pay levels with the levels established in 1974 by Halsbury and in 1980 by Clegg, and take into account movements in prices and earnings since those dates, we find that a large pay gap amounting to nearly 20% of current salaries exists. It is important to emphasise that the comparison with pay levels set by Halsbury and Clegg is not intended to be purely mechanical. Our point is that on each occasion when an independent review has taken place of nurses' pay in relation to the pay of comparable outside occupations, a substantial increase in nurses' pay has been recommended to bring it into line. We believe that this is strong evidence that a similar independent study carried out today, making similar comparisons, would establish that a substantial increase is needed across the board in order to restore fair pay for nurses. In short, a big gap remains, and a substantial across the board increase is needed to fill it."

Later in the evidence of the staff side to the nurses and midwives Whitley council, it says:

"The Review Body must now be aware of the grave concern and anger within the profession which was caused by the Government's decisions relating to the funding and staging of the 1985 award, although the tone of the Government's written evidence gave some indication of the cynical and intrasigent view it held with regard to funding the award of an independent Review Body. It will be recalled that having acknowledged that the paybill for nurses and PAMs in 1983-84 was some 36 per cent. of health authorities' 'total costs, the Government subsequently stated that pay costs in excess of those allowed for in the public expenditure programme would not be funded. The Government's written evidence concluded that 'the higher pay settlemens turn out to be, the less service development will be possible overall' (para C10). On its own admission this position represented a significant departure from previous years when the level of financial provision has been reviewed in the light of Review Body recommendations and the Government's decisions on them".

On nurses' pay and prices, it goes on to say:

"the current (April 1985) value of the Staff Nurses' pay remains significantly below its real 1975 value. By April, 1986, even with the second, delayed, stage of the 1985 award taken into account (February 1986), the increase in Staff Nurses' pay since 1975 will have been insufficient to accommodate the effect of inflation, let alone facilitate the rise in living standards which has been the experience of the majority of employees over the period."

That is the cry of health workers over the past 15 years or longer at the way that they have continually been left behind other grades, industries and professions.

It is not only the nurses and the ancillary grades that are concerned, but the doctors, who have seen over the years their 1981 review body decision reduced from 9 per cent. to 6 per cent. and in 1984 and 1985 the fourth and fifth rejections of pay review body recommendations. There is anger across the Health Service about pay levels.

Ancillary workers in the Health Service have suffered the largest cut and received the lowest pay, and are very much at the bottom of the pile in the hospital, but no hospital could operate without catering workers, cleaners and porters, all those who do the dirty, filthy unclean jobs that nobody else wants to do. They deserve a substantial increase in their basic levels of pay. There is no reason why people have to live on the poverty wages that they are getting.

I have before me the payslip of a woman in my constituency, Mrs. Gertie Turner, who is employed at the Whittington hospital at Archway. For 23 years and three months she has worked in the Health Service. Until 1977 she worked in the laundry as a press hand, until that department was closed, and since then, she has worked in the linen room. She has the important job of ensuring that the linen is distributed and is available for all the beds, as patients come and go. She has to ensure that the linen is there on time.

I am sure that every hon. Member will agree that such people are the backbone of the Health Service. Mrs. Turner's basic pay is £80·10. She gets a bonus of £17·06 and a London weighting of £13·50. Her weekly pay and allowances total £110·66. After stoppages, she takes home £67·34 for a full week's hard, responsible service. This is a disgraceful figure for somebody who has put in so much work for the Health Service in such a responsible way.

I turn to the claim that has been put forward on behalf of Gertie Turner and thousands of other people like her in the National Health Service. The 1986 trade union claim for ancillary staff council employees includes:

"1. A substantial flat-rate wage increase, as a major step towards the target of two thirds of national average earnings.

2. A revision of the grading structure on equal value principles.

3. A substantial increase in shift and related payments.

4. A reduction in the working week to 35 hours.

5. An increase in annual leave and a change in the calculation of leave from a retrospective to a current basis.

6. A change in the public holidays agreement to provide entitlement for part-time workers whose work on fixed days currently excludes them from most public holidays.

7. The right of access to arbitration."

When I talk about poverty levels of wages and poverty pay in the National Health Service, there is plenty of evidence to support what I am saying. The TUC definition of low pay, two thirds of average male earnings, is £109·06 in 1985 and £117·78 in the current year. The Low Pay Unit has slightly different figures of £115·20 and £124·41. The Council of Europe's decency threshold, 68 per cent. of the average of men and women, shows a figure of £116·28 and £125·58. The supplementary benefit levels for a family with two children would be £123·61. By all those criteria, people like Gertie Turner are well within the current poverty pay levels.

I quote next from the document which was put forward by all the trade unions on the ancillary staffs council, trade union side, at page 7:

"In April 1985 the difference between the average weekly earnings of male NHS ancillary workers and male manual workers throughout the economy was £40·10. The gap with average male earnings was nearly £70 per week. The equivalent earnings gap for women was £96·84. Ten years ago, the earnings gap with male manual workers was £4·90. Nearly 50 per cent. of male ancillary staff earn as little as the lowest 10 per cent. of all manual workers throughout the economy."

The booklet goes on to demonstrate that the problem is even more serious for women full-time ancillary staff. Despite equal pay legislation over the years, it is quite clear to me that women workers in the National Health Service get significantly less on average than their male counterparts.

When a comparison is made of the earnings of female and male full-time ancillary staff as a proportion of all male manual earnings between 1970 and 1985, it is found that there are certain high points. There was a high point in 1971 when women earned 55 per cent. of the male average and men earned just under 90 per cent. There were then the low points which led to the 1973 dispute. After that there was the award which took men to 90 per cent. and women to just under 70 per cent. of earnings. Then there was the low point which led to the 1979 industrial dispute. Following that there was the Clegg award that took women up to about 65 per cent. and men up to about 85 per cent.

The current position, from graphs provided not by trade union sources but by the Government's new earnings survey, is that at present NHS women workers are well below 60 per cent. of male manual earnings and men are just under 80 per cent. of that figure.

Frequently employees in the National Health Service have had their wages compared with those in local government. The gap now exists on every grade between workers in the local authorities who are not overpaid by any means. Under the local authority manual workers' agreement a cook would get £92·40 a week. A National Health Service ancillary cook on grade 6 would get £82·92 a week. At the other end of the scale, a local authority dining room assistant or kitchen assistant—that would be somebody working in the school meals service or in a municipal canteen—would get £83·20 a week. A NHS ancillary worker—canteen, grade 1, domestic—would get £72·53 a week.

Therefore, NHS workers are not happy. The Government must tell us what their policy is towards low paid workers in the NHS. And what is their policy on pay generally in the NHS? When the awards are agreed this year for all grades in the NHS, will the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State undertake that those pay awards will be paid for out of national funds and not by local health authorities being forced either to lay off staff, close hospitals, close wards temporarily, or to lock up wards to subsidise the Government's expenditure in other areas? Will the Government give an undertaking that no longer will health workers, who maintain the health of this nation and who work so hard, for so long and for so little, have to suffer the indignity of poverty wages? I find it ironic that so many Department of Health and Social Security employers are forced at the end of each week to go to another arm of the DHSS to register for the various benefits to which they are entitlted because of the poverty wages that they are given in the first place by their main employer, the DHSS.

8.21 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) has left me with little time, so my points will have to be succinct. It is a pity that he was not here for the debate on competitive tendering. I would recommend him to read that debate and to note the points that were made not only by me but by his hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). It was pointed out that, as a result of competitive tendering in the Barking health authority, the spending on cleaning services has been reduced from £367,000 to £211,000 each year, which means that the saving of £156,000 can be ploughed back into the National Health Service.

The Government's first concern must be to deliver the best possible service to patients. "Patients first" has long been a motto of the Conservative party and of this Government. The increase of 21 per cent. in resources in real terms since this Government came into office in 1979 has been devoted entirely to providing more and more services for patients. Of course the National Health Service must be a good employer. Indeed, it is a good employer and it will continue to be a good employer.

The hon. Member sticks to his origins as a full-time official of the National Union of Public Employees and has placed virtually all the emphasis upon the employees in the NHS. All of us pay them credit for the work they do and the loyalty they show, but we are committed to creating a service that provides the best care for patients. That is why £17 billion of taxpayers' money is devoted every year to that end.

[Mr. Ray Whitney]

We are also proud of the fact that there are 10,000 more doctors and 40,000 more nurses and that there has been a reduction in the number of ancillary workers. I make no apology for that. A widely held view is that, although vital functions are performed by all the other grades in the NHS, it is right that we should concentrate upon those who deliver patient care. It is not surprising that, since the NHS employs about 1 million people, there will be a spread of incomes. The hon. Member took a U-turn somewhere in his speech. At one point he was objecting to the fact that consultants were paid much more than ancillary workers for whom he seemed principally to be speaking. Later he went into his other mode of demanding more for medical staff, nurses and ancillaries. In many ways that is an objective, but any sensible Government must take all those decisions against the background of the need to make choices and to assess priorities.

In regard to nurses' pay, I participated in a television discussion on Monday with Mr. Trevor Clay of the Royal College of Nursing, where he described last year's settlement for nurses as reasonable. That was an important recognition by the leader of the RCN that we kept faith by giving a significant increase in real terms in pay in that sector, set against a significant increase also in the number of nurses.

The hon. Gentleman has put down an early-day motion. He insists on the need to seek an arbitrary figure of two thirds of the average income for all workers. It is difficult to see the logic of that in a service as large as the Health Service. With nearly 1 million employees there can be no suggestion that everyone should get two thirds of the average. The whole thing would become nonsense and we should soon be back into the realms of inflation.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned with some disparagement the amount of money going to chairmen. Does he understand that basically the honorarium of a chairman is only about £10,000 a year? That is for being responsible for a multi-million pound enterprise, be it a district or regional health authority. By any terms that is good value for money. I pay tribute to the great sense of public spirit which motivates chairmen throughout health authorities.

The hon. Gentleman made great play of the problems of Mrs. Gertie Turner, whose gross wage is £110·66 per week and who takes home £67·34. How grateful I am to the hon. Gentleman for bringing to the House the case of Mrs. Turner. She has £43 of stoppages out of a weekly gross wage of £110. I invite the hon. Gentleman to reflect a little. That is precisely the point we are trying to deal with. The hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends wish to increase public spending by £24 billion or whatever is the costed figure of their proposals. What, then, would be the burden on Mrs. Turner? The stoppages would not be £43 or even £50; they would be £60 or £70. He should reflect on that every time he suggests yet more spending. If he considers that a 21 per cent. increase in the resources of the Health Service since 1979 is not enough, let him consider not us, not the Chancellor of the Exchequer but Mrs. Gertie Turner and just how much he would ask her to pay to maintain the Health Service and all the other things which he demands.

Pay in the Health Service is extremely important. Only yesterday the Whitley council met and negotiations are at an important stage. I do not wish to say more about it at the moment, but I am glad that meetings are continuing. We recognise that progress must be made. I pay tribute to the important contribution which ancillary workers make to the Health Service. There is no solution in simply writing cheques which quickly become worthless—for reasons which the hon. Gentleman, being a member of the Labour party, should recognise. That is precisely the road down which his Government took the country and down which we shall not go again. It was in his Government's time that the resources of the Health Service were cut in real terms——

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Traffic (Dulwich)

9.35 am

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): I beg leave, Mr. Speaker, to present a petition on behalf of my constituents who live in Therapia road, Marmora road and Scutari road, east Dulwich. Those are quite residential side streets which have recently been used by heavy vehicles, particularly buses. The number 63 bus has a turning point when it comes to the end of its route at Honor Oak and that has caused unwarranted wear and tear on the surface of those side roads, which have not been constructed to take such traffic, has caused vibrations to the surrounding buildings and has had a deleterious effect on the houses there. In particular, it has left parents in fear for their children who had previously been able to play freely on those quiet side streets.

My petitioners urge

"the Secretary of State for Transport to regulate these roads in such a way that heavy vehicles, particularly London Transport buses, do not use these roads as a means of passage."

I wholeheartedly support my petitioners.

To lie upon the Table.

Shops Bill

9.36 am

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): I beg to ask leave to present a petition on behalf of nearly 2,000 of my constituents in south-west Cambridgeshire with which I agree and in which they express opposition to

"the provision for unlimited Sunday Trading in the Shops Bill currently before Parliament, recognising that Sunday has special characteristics as a day of rest, recreation and worship for the benefit of our family and community life."

They pray that the House do

"maintain legal limitations on Sunday Trading to ensure that the special character of Sunday is protected.

And your Petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray, etc."

I have studied this petition, Mr. Speaker, and I can inform the House that it comes from all parts of my constituency, which consists of some 56 villages and parish councils, some of them more than 30 miles apart, and it comes also from a broad cross-section of the community.

To lie upon the Table.

National Health Service (Management)

9.37 am

Mr. Steve Norris (Oxford, East): I beg to move,

That this House regards the Report of the National Health Service Management Inquiry of 6th October 1983 as an invaluable guide to the efficient management of National Health Service resources; welcomes the implementation of the major recommendations of the Report and in particular the appointment of general managers at regional, district and unit level within the National Health Service; recognises that there may now be the opportunity further to improve upon what has already been achieved in the light of practical experience; further recalls that the key objective of management restructuring was identified in guidance sent to health authorities in 1984 as the improvement in standards in service to patients; and resolves to continue to examine the consequences of, and to encourage further, management innovation so as to ensure that the maximum possible amount of National Health Service resources is targeted as effectively, efficiently and sympathetically as possible on the direct care of patients.

It is a great pleasure, is it not—I ask myself that rhetorically because sometimes I wonder. Having appended one's name at the instigation of one's party's Whips to the ballot for motions, one finds that one has had the immense misfortune to be successful. It is a great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to have the opportunity to raise a subject which is of considerable interest to me and has been since I made my maiden speech in the House on it —the National Health Service and, in particular, its management.

Management in the NHS has a particular meaning. We are talking, as I think is one of the common aphorisms about the NHS, of the largest employer in western Europe and, as I understand it, excluding the Red Army, the largest employer in Europe.

I am delighted to see that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has found time from his extremely busy schedule to be here in the Chamber. I thank him for his attention to this important subject. I am also grateful to see my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary in his place.

As the House will know, I was until recently vice-chairman of West Berkshire district health authority. I pay warm tribute to my colleagues of all political persuasions and backgrounds who worked with me on that authority who performed splendidly and continue to do so. They have provided me with invaluable insight into the day-to-day management of the service. It is extremely important that the House should not lose sight of the way in which the great decisions that we make here actually interact on the ground.

My interest does not stem just from my own experience on a health authority. Although my constituency is traditionally known for car-making activities, Oxford is the home of a substantial number of first-class health care services. The Radcliffe infirmary, the John Radcliffe new site, the Churchill, the Nuffield orthopaedic and the Slade, Littlemore and Warneford hospitals are all very large Health Service providers in my constituency and that of the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction, my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten), and I hope that this debate will be equally relevant to those institutions.

Before dealing with the new Health Service management arrangements, I should say a brief word about the old arrangements. In the debate on 4 May 1984, I referred to the danger of over-simplifying the whole question of consensus management and the Griffiths proposals as alternative ideologies. I suggested then that to give the impression that consensus management was all wrong would be extremely dangerous. Seeing how the decision-making process was carried out, one had to recognise that many decisions required the cogwheel approach and recognition of the interrelatinship between disciplines and skills which was the cornerstone of the old consensus arrangement. It would have been damaging indeed to decide that the baby should be thrown out with the bath water and that the idea of gaining support for decisions across technical boundaries was necessarily wrong.

Nevertheless, I think that it is generally recognised that consensus management was, sadly, too often a recipe for inertia, with a paralysing effect on the mobilisation of resources and, worse, at the point of delivery of services and sometimes on the quality of service provided. The Government's response to that inertia was the NHS management inquiry by Sir Roy Griffiths whose report the Government accepted in principle and implemented.

It may be for the convenience of later contributors to the debate if I set out the background to my remarks by quoting circular HC(84)13 in which the Government set out the rationale for what they sought to achieve from the management reorganisation. The circular states:

"The Government's overriding concern is to see that the National Health Service provides the best possible service to patients within the available resources. We are seeking to ensure that the expenditure devoted to the Service"—

£13 billion in England that year——

"does reach its target: improvement in the physical and mental health of the people and in the prevention, diagnosis and treatment of illness. We have, with health authorities, already established a programme to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of the NHS".

The circular made the point that the management inquiry report endorsed the Government's view of the management's task when it said:

"It cannot be said too often that the National Health Service is about delivering services to people. It is not about organising systems for their own sake . . . the driving force behind our advice is the concern to secure the best motivation for staff. As a caring, quality service, the NHS has to balance the interests of the patient, the community, the taxpayer and the employees."

The management inquiry report went on to identify the importance of a clearly defined general management function drawing together responsibility for planning, implementation and control of performance as the key to ensuring and achieving the management drive necessary to ensure that the standard and range of care provided by the Health Service were the best possible within available resources.

Those are fine words and I believe that there is good reason to believe that we are on the way to seeing them implemented in practice.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The hon. Gentleman used the phrase "in practice". Does he intend to dwell on the principle that the people who have to take the buck for management decisions about scarce resources at ward and unit hospital level are qualified and have sufficient experience, especially in the nursing profession, without which those resources cannot be used properly? I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not expect final decisions about the administration of the House, and taken by the House of Commons Commission, to be taken out of the hands of people with experience as Members of Parliament.

Mr. Norris: I suspect that that point will arise on a number of occasions this morning and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will wish to expand on it if he has the opportunity to participate in the debate. I well recognise the concern about the implementation of Griffiths in that respect, and I shall be saying something about that. I know that Members on both sides will also wish to enlarge on what is clearly an area of concern which is fundamental to the reorganisation. It is, indeed, a cardinal principle of the service that any reorganisation should not be at the expense of the level of competence at the point of professional delivery of service. I accept the hon. Gentleman's comments. I intend to deal with that point, as no doubt will other hon. Members. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State may also wish to comment on that aspect.

I wish to examine how effectively the aspirations to which I have referred have materialised. So far, certain successes have been identified but there are also certain problems. The sooner the successes are identified and built on and the sooner the problems are identified and eradicated, the better will be the service for patients. I must tell the House, and especially the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), that my discussions about the success or otherwise of Griffiths with managers who are in no sense beholden to me for their answers has been extremely encouraging.

I have been surprised at the extent to which managers now in post have referred, to use their own words, to crisper management, quicker decisions, quicker local problem solving and individuals being given tasks and made responsible for carrying them out. Although group decisions — the good old consensus — still occur, especially in relation to items such as the district review, the impact of the annual budgeting exercise and priorities for services and new money where best practice exists decisions are still made after extensive consultation on both a one-to-one basis and a group basis.

We should never lose sight of the fact that there is now the opportunity for day-to-day decision making which does not involve the establishment of any great new principle and does not offend any great new norm in the service, and that those decisions are now made more quickly and more effectively. I submit that that is of the greatest benefit to the service as a whole, by which I mean the greatest possible benefit to patients.

I shall deal briefly with the concerns which have been expressed recently by the Royal College of Nursing, and by the British Medical Association and other professional bodies prior to the implementation of the Griffiths report. In all instances I treat their contributions to the debate with the utmost seriousness. The various contributions have been made with the highest standards of integrity and concern for patients. I recognise that in that sense their motives are impeccable. I hope that they will not be offended if my response is to suggest that the real picture may not be quite as they have suggested. I suggest that their views have not been wholly justified by word or in the event.

I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health—I am grateful to him for his interest in what I am about to say—will recall his letter of 20 November 1985 to all regional health authority chairmen, in which he stated:

"most district management structures provide for medical and nursing membership of the district management board or similar body. Were this is not the case, I believe that it is important that alternative arrangements command the confidence and commitment of all the medical and nursing interests locally."

My right hon. Friend said to health authorities, in my view rightly, that it would be wrong and misconveived of general managers at any level within the Health Service to imagine that the new notion of management accountability had overtaken all notions of the need for clinical input at the highest level. If that misconception ever existed in the minds of general managers on any scale, I believe that it has been dispelled by my right hon. Friend's intervention.

It is a misconception also to imagine that fewer units of management necessarily mean worse service or worse professional input. I understand the concern that has been expressed articulately to me by colleagues who are members of the Royal College of Nursing about the reduction in overall numbers of units in the Health Service. There is a clear danger of imposing a form of management which harks too much towards the "big is beautiful" concept, which we all, to our individual regret, came to realise was not entirely consonant with efficiency or the best quality of service. On the other hand, it would be somewhat misleading to imply that there are not occasions when the original unit structure that was set up following the last reorganisation cannot now, in the light of experience, be honed and refined to produce fewer chiefs and more Indians.

There was much with which I was not happy in the last reorganisation of the Health Service. For example, I warned that we were running the risk of removing one area of bureaucracy and replacing it with two equal local bureaucracies, with little benefit for patients at the end of the day. However, the health authority in the area that I represent was able almost to halve the number of nurse managers who previously had no hands-on contact with patients. That is something which nurses, as true professionals, welcomed. The reduction in the number of nurse managers did not result in fewer nurses being employed. Instead, more of them were able to be involved in hands-on experience, which has been of great benefit to the Health Service as a whole.

Some have expressed concern that the new arrangements will result in a diminution of professional standards and the voice of the professions. They are right to sound that warning, but my right hon. Friends the Minister for Health and the Secretary of State for Social Services, in their utterances and in the letters which they have written on the subject, have made it clear that the Department never seeks to substitute management as a concept over and above or instead of that of professional input at the highest level, and the maintenance of that high level, within the service. I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will concentrate on that when he contributes to the debate.

It would worry me if undue account were taken of, for example, the relegation of titles, whether DMO, DNS or DNO, from structures, and if it were thought that it showed that nursing or medical advice could not find its way into the new system. That would be nonsense. We are changing the way in which advice is given to those who have to make decisions, but the suggestion that it is not there—I am no apologist for my right hon. Friend and I would be the first to express my views if I felt that there were real dangers—does not reflect the true situation. I have not seen the dangers materialise to which some have referred.

To support what I say, and in preparation for this debate, I took the opportunity to have a word with Sir Raymond Hoffenberg, the distinguished president of the Royal College of Physicians. I asked him especially and specifically about the attitude of his members to the Griffiths report, they being much involved in its implementation from day to day. He said, not unnaturally, that if he were asked to express the feelings of his members, he would say that they would be of concern on a similar line to the concern which the BMA expressed before the implementation of the report, and similar to the concern which the Royal College of Nursing currently expresses.

Sir Raymond made it clear to me that he could speak only of anecdotal and unsupported evidence of problems at regional and district levels, where general management appointments have been made at ground level. That has been my experience as well. I read carefully the RCN campaign document, with which we have all been involved. The college was kind enough to talk to me about its concerns. I can find no evidence of reduced levels of professionalism or care in hospitals as a result of reducing the number of chiefs to the benefit of the Indians, but I recognise that theoretically the opportunity exists for that to happen unless adequate precautions are taken. It is one thing to argue that there has been a reduction in the level of professionalism or of care in hospitals and another to point to actual reductions.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): There may have been cuts in administrative staff, but many of them have been in the clerical section. In many hospitals there is not a sufficient clerical staff to provide the service that consultants, doctors and nurses need in carrying out their jobs.

Mr. Norris: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point and I know his expertise in these matters, which I much respect. I think that he will agree with me that the difficulty in responding to his argument and the difficulty about his intervention is that it invites the consideration of specific examples. It leads to the question, "What was the arrangement for the delivery of epidemiological, medical, clinical and technical input and what are the new arrangements?" The new arrangements may be slimmer and involve fewer persons in the expression of technical advice. The advice may come from those whose titles we do not yet recognise as conventional, but that does not mean that the quality of the service has been lowered. The time to worry is when we see a difference in the provision of actual service, which must be our paramount concern. I recognise the sincerity with which the warnings have been delivered, but I do not find at this moment that they are justified.

But there is much still to be said about some of the technical disadvantages of the present arrangements. I mentioned one point in the debate in May because I felt that it was important, and I shall mention it again. I refer to the question of how we employ general managers. We use the concept of fixed term contracts. From my business experience I know that I would employ someone on a fixed term contract only if I had a specific job for him to do. For example, if I wanted to build a power station, I might employ a site manager and give him a fixed term contract. When the job came to an end, he would go elsewhere. He would understand the situation, and it would not ruin his motivation but rather enhance it, as he would want to see the job done within the time allocated. But I would not use fixed-term contracts for continuing employment, if I was interested in ensuring that morale was maintained at the highest level and that I was getting everything I could out of the best people for the job.

Four areas in which problems have arisen were identified in a very helpful article by Robin Gourlay. He is the Wessex regional personnel officer, and in July 1985, in an article in the Health and Social Service Journal, he wrote:

"First, consider the recruitment problem. If you were to advertise a general manager job to managers outside the NHS, offering a fixed term contract of three or five years and a salary probably well below what they consider the job worth in comparison to their own organisation, you are unlikely to attract the best recruits. Why should they threaten their own potentially successful careers with ICI, Shell, IBM or whoever, for a lower financial reward than they could expect—or maybe are already getting? Anyway, the potential amputation of a career will deter the type of manager the NHS needs."

I heartily endorse that description of the disadvantage of the fixed term contract.

The sub-editors of the article rather brilliantly, for once, caught the spirit of what Robin Gourlay was trying to say in the following headline:

"Contract renewal could rest on personal affability."

The article then continued:

"Second, how can a general manager be evaluated and what truly objective basis can be used for saying whether he or she succeeded or failed? Without such a basis the question of contract renewal could rest on whether or not the authority chairman likes the general manager."

That observation may be banal, but it is all the more frighteningly true for it. We will find that at the end of three or five years the personal or political relationships between the general manager and the members of the authority may sometimes weigh more heavily than it should do.

Robin Gourlay then states:

"Third, the implications of Griffiths were expected to bring about changes in the NHS. Changes mean risk and cost — the risk of failure, and the cost of turbulence. Such failures and costs can count against the general manager and prejudice his reappointment as a disenchanted mafia builds up a wave of unpopularity around him. So be it, you may say —general managers are not there to court popularity. This is so, but if the potential of success is outweighed by the personal costs of failure, which general manager is going to take those risks currently demanded of the NHS?

Fourth, consider the image of the NHS as an employer and its ability to retain managers of potential. Most large organisations develop their own managers . . . They create many incentives (of both a financial and non financial kind) to keep their managers . . . It is through the practice of such consideration that companies compete to attract and retain their general managers. This is not pure altruism . . . These companies invest a great deal in their managers and their development and to lose such investment through careless personnel policies is like publicly burning your profits.

A failed general manager reflects a failed organisation. The failure of a general manager is just as much the failure of the organisation that has provided the job, as it is the lack of competence of the manager."

I suspect that we use the fixed-term contract because of our inability to define, within Whitley, the termination of contracts for professional reasons other than gross misconduct. We are in the bind that if we employ people on indefinite contracts, we have the greatest difficulty in confronting them with any shortfall in performance, becaue their performance is a controversial matter and because of the practical difficulty of implementing the employment protection regulations and so on. Thus, a substantial review of Whitley is needed. I urge my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to consider carefully the question of fixed term contracts to see what can be done to replace a mechanism that works against the interests of the service and the professionalism within it.

There is a matter of perhaps less strategic importance, but which is of great concern to individual managers. I refer to the differential pay scales between some insiders and outsiders and, perhaps worse, between insiders and insiders. One golden rule of management is that one should never pay two people different salaries for doing exactly the same job or pay someone more money for doing a lesser job than someone else. That is rule number one in any management's book. But there is another rule that appeared in the best book on management that I ever read, and I believe it should be observed in the House. It said that it was useful to have someone on the board of directors who knew where the factory was. During my business career I have noted how appropriate that aphorism is and believe that it should apply almost de rigeur in the House.

I was a member of my health authority and I know, because I was involved in its implementarion, that, horrifyingly, our district manager gets £7,000 less than his own district medical officer, after his enhancement. Yet the district manager is in charge of the district medical officer and is the primus inter pares. If that was not illogical enough — there may even be some marginal justification for it — he gets £6,000 less than Milton Keynes district general manager. I do not know that man, although I am sure that he is a splendid person, but he happens to be a former doctor. Nevertheless, the budget of the whole Milton Keynes authority is less than the budget of the largest hospital in our district, the Royal Berkshire, and makes nonsense of the idea of providing a career and salary incentive structure.

Lynn Alleway, writing in the Health and Social Service Journal, noted:

"For people coming from outside, while the sky was not the limit, there were no such clearly defined restrictions. This has led to some significant anomalies. For example, the highest-paid RGM, Mike King in East Anglia, a former management consultant, is earning about £45,000 a year, £15,000 to £18,000 more than other RGMs from the NHS. Similarly there are district general managers from the private sector earning as much as £32,000—about £4,000 more than even many regional general managers with an NHS background. And yet in spite of this, salaries of £30,000 or £40,000 do not compare with deals available in the private sector."

I understand that a report prepared by the Department on the whole issue of general managers' pay, containing advice from three or four regional chairmen, and from management consultants brought in from outside, has been with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State since June 1985. I see him demurring, and no doubt he will clarify the position later. However, I am sure that professionals would welcome clarification of the position. It is important to get pay right. We are talking about producing a much more relevant career structure for professionals, and pay is a factor in that.

Incentive is equally important. I acknowledge that we probably do not have the mechanism for introducing the right type of incentive for managers beyond the incentive of seeing a job well done. We must give some priority to that. We must create what any business person knows is his first and most important task — a happy and motivated management team. I am not suggesting for one moment that there is no motivation or that there is not great dedication and expertise, but we have some way to go.

General managers' pay is negotiable, subject to upward approval, but other staff posts are appointable only within the general structure of the Whitley council agreements. That is not surprising, bearing in mind the effect that Whitley has had on the pay and conditions structure in the NHS, but it only underlines the extent to which Whitley was a reflection of the old management arrangements. It needs a radical overhaul if it is to be relevant and effective.

I warn my right hon. Friend that the nature of NHS decision-making may be working against the interests of independent manager operation. I welcome the district review procedure, the annual report procedure and the whole accountability review process, but decisions are being implemented from the Department down the ladder, and general managers are often merely the method of implementing policies that have been decided elsewhere.

Members have been affected by the management reorganisation far more than we have been prepared to recognise. The circular defines members' role as follows:

"Determine policies and priorities for their district within national and regional guidelines and on the advice of their officers; Review and, where necessary, challenge proposals by the district management team and to make effective arrangements for the implementation of the authority's decisions; Appoint and monitor the performance of their chief officers; As the direct employer of a large number of staff, concern themselves with their working conditions, general interests and welfare (but not pay and conditions of service, which are determined nationally)."

That was wholly appropriate to the old arrangements but Griffiths has changed it all. If general managers now report much more closely to chairmen, who are the only paid representatives on the authority, health authority members have a role much more akin to that of community health councils. Both are appointed bodies.

The more one examines the old role of members and how it has been changed fundamentally by Griffiths, the more their new role is revealed as being the patient's friend, the monitor of standards, the determiner of priorities and the articulator of public concerns. The role of CHC and the authority member, which has always been anomalous, ought now to be reconsidered. It is unnecessary to have two bodies charged with almost identical roles for the supervision of standards which often act against each other and against interests of the service.

I am sure that the NHS Management Board has made great achievements, especially in computing and information systems but, talking to senior NHS personnel, I discern no recognition of achievements on the ground. That comment is based not on my experience but on what I have been told by many professionals. These are early days and my right hon. Friend might be able to reassure the House but, unless the board proves its worth shortly and illustrates that it is contributing to the more effective and efficient management of the services the sooner yet another layer of bureaucracy goes, the better I shall be pleased. We must see results soon.

It would be wrong to assume that the whole debate should centre on Griffiths. I should not be doing my right hon. Friend any service if I did not make it clear that the introduction and innovation of management budgeting, the value-for-money initiatives, the Rayner scrutinies and, contentious as it might be to say so, the competitive tendering exercises, have been of the most positive benefit to authorities in providing and unlocking funds that can be used for patient care. It is scandalous that resources are wasted on hotel and catering services when they could be spent on patient care.

As the DHSS controls the budget, it controls manpower. If caring services in the NHS are about people, what is saved on cleaning should be spent on nursing. If there is a £70,000 saving on catering and that money can buy seven community nurses, I do not want an artificial control on manpower which prevents the money from being spent in that way.

I have great admiration for what has been achieved. The introduction of management efficiency was desperately needed. As Baroness Trumpington said in another place last week:

"the key objective in introducing general management to the NHS . . . has been to improve service to patients." [Official Report, House of Lords, 4 March 1986, Vol. 472, c. 158.]

I apologise for the length of my speech, but I am reminded of the words of one of my favourite popular songs which runs:

"It's my party, and I'll cry if I want to."

If there is any merit in winning the ballot, it is that, for once, I do not feel quite as constrained as I might normally. I know that the Government's paramount objective has always been to improve the service to patients. The broad thrust of management reorganisation will assist to that end. I urge my right hon. Friend and his colleagues to take account of what I hope he will regard as my constructive criticisms of the performance so far, and continue his laudable and vital initiative.

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): I congratulate the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) on winning the ballot and on presenting his case with such lucidity, drawing on his considerable experience of the NHS. He was a valued member of the Social Services Select Committee for some time, but then he decided to desert us. We miss him very much.

As the House knows, the Select Committee examined the Government's proposals for setting up the Griffiths management complex, and we were worried about the manpower and resource problems of the NHS, as was the Secretary of State. We reported in February 1984 after hearing evidence from all the major professional, medical and nursing organisations and others who work in the NHS. We also heard from Mr. Griffiths himself.

Nobody in his right mind can object to reasonable proposals for the better and more effective use of human and financial resources. Nobody can object to better management aimed at delivering better patient care. That must be the object of the exercise, but we felt that the Griffiths proposals were thin in detail and lacking in lucidity. We said in our report:

[Mrs. Renée Short]

"there is an obligation on the Secretary of State to be more than commonly lucid and explicit when he comes to announce his decisions."

The House must judge whether he took that good advice to heart. I have very strong views about the results so far of Griffiths and its applications.

The House will recall that there was a signal lack of enthusiasm when the Griffiths proposals were published. They were seen, rightly in some respects, as an attack on doctors and on NHS staff at all levels, but they were seen especially as sounding their death knell for nurse management, which had been introduced some years previously. Griffiths was the third attempt in 10 years to deal with NHS management, and we thought that this upheaval was taking place too soon after the recent attempts to change the management structure. NHS staff at all levels become fed up when people with no experience of their great service begin yet another attempt to meddle. The House may find it difficult to comprehend, but it is true that, originally, Griffiths had no intention of including the chief nursing officer on the supervisory board or the management board. That was changed as a result of the Select Committee report. It was a telling omission by Griffiths — a Freudian slip of mammoth proportions.

For some time the Royal College of Nursing has been worried about the failure of the innumerable layers of management to ensure effective and safe patient care. That is unfair and dangerous to patients. It is also unfair to doctors prescribing treatment to patients for whom they are responsible. Of course, it could be fatal for the unfortunate patients. Who is responsible for nursing staff at district level if there is no chief nursing officer? Who will take resposibility for nursing care when the chief nurse/adviser — as some health authorities call them — is involved only with nurse education? That is a dangerous development and the Secretary of State should take the point on board.

The Secretary of State must know that, in many areas, nurses who care for patients are expected to be subject to managers who know nothing about nursing and who cannot have a professional view of the competence of the nurses on the wards. That is another difficult problem that has arisen in many areas and it has created much hostility between nurses and managers. In some hospitals, ward sisters' posts will be abolished. We shall have the nonsense of managers being appointed, down to ward level, who know nothing about nursing. The Secretary of State must do something about this Gilbertian situation.

Does the Secretary of State have any idea of the cost of all this bureaucratic nonsense? As the hon. Gentleman said, we want to spend money on hands-on patient care, which is what the Health Service should be about. We must invest in more caring staff, not in dictators at ward, unit, district or regional level. This is a bureaucratic nightmare, and an expensive one, too.

Chairmen have an important role to play in the management of their areas. Many new chairmen have been appointed in all the regions, especially since Griffiths. In the west midlands, 10 district chairmen were recently turfed out after only one term of office and 10 new chaps were brought in. I say "chaps" advisedly, because there were no women among those who were sacked or among those who took their place. How much experience of NHS management do their replacements have? It is extraordinary to think that before people have got their feet on the ground and obtained an understanding of how the Health Service works, especially under the new management system, they are being sacked. What criteria did the regional chairman use to measure the value or otherwise of the deposed chairmen? Perhaps he thought that the chairmen were getting on too well with the managers and that he should break up that cosy relationship.

Doctors have not come out too well under the new management structure. I understand that there is only one doctor regional manager, 13 doctor managers at district level and about 20 per cent. at unit level. There must be doctors on the district management teams. The British Medical Association is keeping an eye on appointments and is asking that a consultant, a general practitioner and a community physician be appointed to each DMT. Perhaps the Minister will let us know what progress he has made with that.

Recently, the Comptroller and Auditor General drew attention to the way in which some health authorities had been saving money at the expense of health care standards. He is concerned that efficiency savings are not being put back into patient care. I am sure that the Minister wants efficiency savings to be used for that purpose, and perhaps he will respond to the Comptroller and Auditor General's comments. I understand that cost improvement schemes saved £105·2 million in 1984-85. In 1985-86, savings are estimated to be £153 million, which will represent a considerable increase. What will happen to that money? Will it be used to improve patient care?

Unless more money is invested in the National Health Service, managers will be left with the appalling dilemma of having to choose between meeting the needs of the service and reducing salaries. There is no other option. The Royal College of Nursing and the Institute of Health Service Administrators have told the right hon. Gentleman clearly about this, and the centre for Health Service management at York university has given similar advice. The Minister says that that is a major error of the report, but I challenge him to enter any large hospital and find out exactly what is happening. He need not go much further than the hospital across the river, St. Thomas's, or to Westminster hospital, to discover the difficulties that they are experiencing. In many especially sensitive areas, such as the perinatal mortality rate, he will discover a considerable contraction in service to patients and advice to mothers in hospitals and in the communities which they serve. That is extremely worrying to hospital administrators.

As one of the small minority of women in the House, I must protest at the small number of women who have been appointed to management posts in the NHS. Since 1974, more than half the graduates attending NHS management training courses have been women, and women comprise more than 70 per cent. of National Health Service employees, but not——

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Is my hon. Friend aware that the only medical specialty on which the Government have spent millions on management training is nurses, but that few of them are being appointed?

Mrs. Short: That is correct, and that is part of the difficulty to which the Royal College of Nursing drew attention. The efficient women who work in the National Health Service, even those who do not wish to take on management responsibility, feel deprived and frustrated. Since 1974 more than half the graduates attending NHS management training courses have been women, which is a significant proportion. Yet women comprise more than 77 per cent. of NHS employees. Therefore, one can legitimately ask what has happened to all those women trained at public expense. Where have they gone? Why have they not been appointed to management posts? A survey carried out by the King's Fund shows how unsatisfactory the position is. The wastage occurred among men as well, but it was three times as high among women who had taken training courses. Therefore, it is a serious waste of talent. I hope that the Minister will do something about it.

Some time ago the Secretary of State defended his health plan in a speech to chartered accountants in Brighton. Perhaps he will recall what he said. According to a newspaper report,

"He said it did not mean 'increased costs and more jobs for the boys.'"

It certainly has meant a large number of jobs for the boys, and very few jobs for the girls. The right hon. Gentleman should take that on board. He said in that speech:

"We are not just giving people new titles to put on their doors and more money for doing the same jobs . . . The general manager will have to show that he can make the Health Service run better and can get decisions made and put in effect."

The Secretary of State must admit that that honourable goal has not been achieved. The House will want to know what he intends to do to improve not only the standard of management but the breadth of talent that he proposes to take into the different levels of management to meet the considerable objections that have been made to the type of persons who have been appointed to many of the posts. A rationalisation and simplification of the several layers of management will go a long way towards meeting the real objections of the professionals working in the NHS, who feel that their expertise has not been used and taken into account.

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): I should like to intervene at this stage of the debate. As I explained to my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris), I shall not be able to stay for the whole debate, but my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State will be here throughout. As he has responded to four debates during the past 13 hours, we thought that he might as well stay for this one.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East on giving us the opportunity to debate the management of the National Health Service. At the beginning of his speech, he made some remarks about putting his name in the ballot, but, whatever may have been the pressure brought on him to do so, it is entirely from his own choice that we are debating the Griffiths report today. I congratulate him not only on his speech but on the way in which he has emphasised the fundamental importance of the issue.

I agreed with what my hon. Friend said about consensus in management. Although the new changes mark an end to the old system of the consensus teams, they do not mark an end to consensus in management. General managers are not autocrats; they cannot be. They must build on the present consensus team approach.

I also agreed with what my hon. Friend said about the signs concerning the new management process. Like him, I believe that the signs are encouraging, not discouraging. My hon. Friend referred to the permanent pay structure for general managers. I accept that such matters will have to be settled shortly, and I think that we shall be able to satisfy my hon. Friend on that point.

I agreed with a number—not all—of the points made by the distinguished Chairman of the Select Committee on Social Services, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short). No one would be more pleased than me if we could get more women managers into the Health Service. That is a good policy aim. I should also like to see the development of management training throughout the Health Service.

Basically, the debate is about seeking to get the NHS to work better. Over the coming year, the Health Service's budget will be about £18·7 billion, an increase of 24 per cent. in real terms since 1978-79, but it is vital that those resources are used to best effect, by which I mean that we should give the best possible service to the public. The starting point of any policy must be to seek to provide the best possible service to the public. It is not a matter of controversy between hon. Members that, in seeking that goal, we must aim to achieve as effective management in the Health Service as possible.

That is the same challenge faced by any service or company, but with perhaps this differenee. The challenge of management in the Health Service is probably greater than that in any other service and possibly any other industry. The Health Service employs about 800,000 full-time staff. By any standards, that makes it an enormous service, the biggest employer in the country, and probably the biggest employer in western Europe. We should be under no illusion about the problems that are implied in the management of a service of that size, for if good management is essential in small and medium-sized companies, it is doubly important in a giant service such as this. Again, I hope that that is not a matter of controversy between both sides of the House.

At the same time, we must recognise one other feature of the Health Service—indeed, of any health service in any country. Demand for services is constantly rising. The fact that the number of elderly and very elderly people is increasing and likely to go on increasing provides inevitable demands on a service where a high proportion —about 40 per cent.—of the costs is accounted for by services for the elderly, while medical advance—the development of new treatments — also makes new demands from the public.

For example, in 1978 there were about 20,000 hip replacements. Today the figure is up to 30,000. Let us look at the history of other medical advances. In 1970, only 1,830 people were treated for kidney failure. Today that figure is over 11,000. In 1977, 2,800 patients had coronary artery bypass surgery. Today that figure is over 9,400.

My point is that it is inherent that medical advance itself produces new demands from the public, which any health service must seek to meet. Therefore, there is a management problem for the Health Service in trying to meet a virtually limitless demand and at the same time trying to improve the quality of the services that are also available.

In meeting that challenge, we have one inestimable advantage, which is the skill and dedication of the staff of the Health Service—not only the doctors and nurses on the wards, but the staff who ensure, for example, that the appointments system does not break down, and the ancillary staff who provide the services that are necessary for any hospital to function properly. I pay tribute to all the staff working in the Health Service, who seek to give a high standard of service to patients day in, day out, and sometimes in circumstances that are far from ideal. That is where the strength of the Health Service lies—in the skills and hard work of its staff.

My concern is not the dedication of the staff, but how this asset is managed. The evidence of the past has not always been enouraging. Let me give one example, which is very much in the recollection of the House, of how the old system of management was clearly, sadly and tragically defective. In the outbreak of food poisoning at the Stanley Royd hospital in Wakefield in 1984, which was prior to the new management changes, 19 people died and 450 patients and staff were infected.

The report clearly revealed a number of basic management difficulties. We now know that grossly unhygienic and unsatisfactory practices were allowed to flourish in the kitchens at Stanley Royd. For example, a drain in the kitchen was found to be blocked by cutlery which had not been removed. There can be no excuse for that. It was a failure of supervision and management. Once the outbreak had occurred the staff on the wards—the nurses and junior doctors—acquitted themselves with real distinction. I pay tribute to them. However, I have to say that some of the managers did not take a sufficiently active role in handling the outbreak. In particular, the report of the inquiry said that it regarded it as unacceptable that some managers considered it their function to monitor and to attend meetings rather than to go out and see what was happening. That was the old system being described. The Committee said it was "one major explanation of why nurses from outside Stanley Royd were not brought in, a decision which was taken without first-hand examination of the situation by those taking the decision".

It is clear that the regional health authority did not have a clear and positive view of its management and leadership role within the region. I think that both sides of the House should be concerned about that. A capital scheme for the improvement of the kitchens at Stanley Royd had been in operation for over four years, with very little progress to show for it. The business simply drifted on with no firm management to ensure that decisions were taken and action progressed.

I go over that ground not to point the finger at individuals, but to remind the House of what the tragedy tells us about the management system which prevailed at that time. It was a system in which authorities and senior staff were not always clear about their roles and responsibilities, in which there was often a lack of leadership and in which individual reponsibility was submerged. No one was responsible and no one was accountable. Such a position would not be tolerated in any well run company. There is no reason—and again I hope that this is not a matter for controversy—why it should exist in the National Health Service. It was because of concerns about the management of the National Health Service that in 1983 I asked Sir Roy Griffiths and his colleagues to give us their advice. Building on the programme that the Government had already established to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the Health Service, the Griffiths report recommended new and important measures which hold the key to improved management.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): May I intervene before the Secretary of State gets to the substance of the Griffiths report? I do not in any way want to underestimate the terrible tragedy of the Stanley Royd hospital and the appalling suffering which occurred as a result. Obviously, there is common ground on that point. However, will the Secretary of State, in his strictures on that tragedy, also consider, by way of getting the record straight, the large number of serious contract failures which have occurred where private cleaning companies and private enterprise have been involved in the National Health Service? There are a large number of them, and I hope that he will recognise that.

Mr. Fowler: I am not sure that there are a large number of them. However, if the hon. Gentleman is asking whether we have the same standards for inside and outside contracting, the answer must be absolutely yes. There is no question of seeking or allowing a lower standard from outside. My point about Stanley Royd was not concerned with any particular method in the sense of the difference between inside and outside contracting. I was saying that it is quite clear that management and supervision had broken down in the hospital. It was not just at kitchen or hospital level, but throughout the whole structure of management.

We are now well advanced in the implementation of the Griffiths report. I think that it is only too easy for the basic message to be obscured or misrepresented. Let me explain what we are aiming to do in introducing the recommended changes. As the report said, the National Health Service is about delivering services to people. It is not about organising systems for their own sake; it is about securing the best deal for patients and the community within available resources, the best value for the taxpayer and the best motivation for staff.

The fundamental importance of the public and patient provides a starting point for all our work. Our aim is to strengthen and improve the service to the public. It is not in the interests of the patient that the NHS should be run ineffectively. Our thrust is to strengthen management and give it a clearer sense of purpose and the means to achieve that purpose.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride) rose——

Mr. Fowler: Please let me continue for a while.

The Griffiths report also identified the need for general management in the NHS. Its absence meant that there was basically no clearly identifiable officer in charge at regional, district or hospital level. I regard that as a basic defect. There was no driving force seeking and accepting personal responsibility for getting plans carried out. The establishment of general management means that at long last there is an answer to the question of who is in charge.

An essential part of the general manager's position is that he should accept personal responsibility for getting things done. Clearly—and I accept what my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East and the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East said—the general manager cannot be a one-man band. Personal responsibility must also be placed on the other staff within the management structure, so an important part of the reshaping of management is the clear definition of the tasks that each person must carry out and the placing of personal responsibility on the individual for carrying them out.

Equally essential are arrangements for holding individuals and authorities accountable for what they do. Before the Griffiths report we had begun the process of sharpening up accountability within the service by introducing reviews of regions by Ministers to monitor performance against agreed objectives. That process has now been developed and extended further.

Dr. Miller: Are we going far enough in this respect? Have we not fallen into the same difficulty as we fell into some time ago in our manufacturing industry where people thought that the only thing to do was to manage and to administer, but we did not have enough engineers who understood the processes to do the administering and managing? Are we not in danger of perpetrating that on the National Health Service? The whole sphere of medicine is not as it was when I graduated. It has become an extremely complicated matter. There are technological and scientific advances, the purpose and operation of which must be understood by the people who are doing the managing. Should we not be going further and having people doing the managing who understand the processes?

Mr. Fowler: To some extent, I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I think that we are at the start of the process. Many of the general managers who have been appointed have come from within the Health Service. Clearly, some administrators have become general managers, but also there have been many doctors and nurses. A minority have come from outside. It is an important minority because it brings fresh perception and management skills to the Health Service. To make the parallel that the hon.

[Mr. Fowler]

Gentleman is making, I think that over the coming years we will need to develop the management skills within the Health Service. We shall have to put more emphasis upon management education and training. To develop good management is not against the interests of the Health Service. It must be in the interests of the Health Service. If I can get no other point accepted, I hope that the House will accept that one.

Dr. Marek: As of 21 January 1986, two of the 14 regional managers and 41 of the 191 district general managers appointed came from outside the NHS — a large number. We are worried that, if the nursing staff has to report, the only person to whom a sister on night duty could turn would be someone with a degree in business administration. Will the right hon. Gentleman comment on that problem?

Mr. Fowler: I think that the hon. Gentleman will accept that, whatever the background of a particular manager, the line for providing professional advice will still continue. That must happen.

The majority of general managers have come from within the Health Service. Of the 676 managers at all levels—regional, district and unit—more than 100 are doctors, 400 are from administration, more than 55 are nurses and 81 are from outside. I am glad that 81 people have come from outside because I believe that is an important aspect of management improvement. It is wrong simply to believe that all the management skills of the Health Service now exist in the Health Service. We want to achieve a reasonable balance. In some ways, I should like more nurses to be appointed, especially at unit level, although more nurses have been appointed at unit level than at any other level. Whatever else has happened, there has been a reasonable range. There has not been a mere redrawing, renaming or relabelling exercise, as we have sometimes had in the past.

Of course I accept that there has been some concern —it has already been expressed in the debate—about the impact of these changes in management on professional staff, especially nurses. I understand that, at a time of change, people are apprehensive about how it will affect them. We shall listen carefully to what is said in the debate.

I shall seek to put straight at least some of the points on record. The Government have the highest regard for nurses and for their contribution to the Health Service. We are employing more nurses than ever before. I believe that changes, such as the introduction of the Nurses and Midwives Pay Review Body, have been widely welcomed by the profession. I wholly agree that nurses should play a full part in the management of the Health Service, both as managers and as professional advisers to general managers and health authorities.

In all, 55 nurses have obtained general manager posts, mostly at unit level. However, a much larger number of nurses are widening their management experience as a result of the changes now occurring. Many senior nurses now combine their professional role with a wider task, such as that of personnel director or director of patient services. The introduction of general management is giving staff of all backgrounds opportunities to show what they can do.

On the provision of nursing advice to district health authorities, I have insisted that every authority should continue to designate one nurse as its principal nursing adviser, that that nurse must be at an appropriately senior level, and that, in that role, he or she must have guaranteed access to the authority. Part of that responsibility will continue to be the monitoring of professional standards of nursing care throughout that authority. The titles by which that nurse is designated vary across the country. Some of the posts may no longer be called chief nursing officer, but every district level authority has its own chief nursing adviser. As I mentioned earlier, some of the chief nursing advisers undertake an additional management role. We have told authorities to ensure that the professional advisory function is the main responsibility and that the chief nurse has adequate support to discharge it.

As far as units are concerned, it is important to be clear about the position from which we are moving. Previously, the director of nursing services answered both professionally and managerially to the district nursing officer. Clearly, with the introduction of general managers at unit level, that arrangement cannot and, indeed, should not continue, and the line of responsibility should go to the manager of the unit. The manager has the responsibility for getting things done, but he leads a multidisciplinary team and he must, of course, respect the professional competence of each professional in the team.

Our approach to management structures has differed from the one adopted in the early 1970s when the Government sought to impose patterns and a blueprint throughout the United Kingdom. Our approach to management structures has been to allow health authorities the flexibility and freedom they need to make arrangements that best suit local circumstances. That is a deliberate policy. It is a sensible policy because we want to avoid centrally imposed bureaucratic structures. Districts and, even more so, units vary enormously across the country. District health authorities are best placed to devise the right solutions for them. We have insisted that, in doing so, they should consult professional staff interests at every turn.

My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East raised with me the role of the NHS Management Board. That is not an additional layer of bureaucracy. Griffiths recommended that within the Department and within the existing statutory structure there should be a management board. That means that Ministers remain responsible for policy but now have the support of a board inside the Department which is dedicated full time to better management of the health authorities' services.

The board, therefore, brings the Department's role in management of health authorities into clearer focus. Its aim is to cut down unnecessary intervention from the centre. I assume that we all want that. Its aim is also to bring new skills to bear on those tasks which must be led from the centre — such as personnel, financial management, procurement, estate management and information technology—to give leadership to the health authorities by bringing together people from the private sector, the Department and the NHS itself—they are all represented on the board—and to get better services and better value for money from the health authorities by regular monitoring and review of their performance against those objectives.

Mr. Pavitt: Has not that job description borne out the point made by the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris), that another tier of management has been inserted? There are various sections within the NHS—for example, personnel. Instead of those sections having direct access to the Secretary of State, another tier will intervene.

Mr. Fowler: That is a fundamental misconception of how the DHSS is organised. There is a focus now where there was not one previously. The functions remain very much the same but they are focused and the Management Board will report to the Secretary of State. That means more effective management instead of the rather ad hoc system by which, I concede, we did things in the past. The board is introducing greater professionalism into the running of the Health Service at departmental level. It would be extremely curious if, having asked health authorities to do that, the DHSS were not prepared to do it as well.

I believe that we have made significant progress towards improving National Health Service management. I accept that there is still a great deal left to be done because I believe that we are, in many ways, at the beginning of this process. I think that a contribution has been made through the appointment of general managers, the extension of the accountability review system down to hospital level, and the institution of the new system of performance reviews. In the end, what the House and the public want to see are results—results in terms of better services for patients and better value for money.

Clearly, it will be some time before the full benefit can be delivered from all the changes that we have made and are currently making. I would claim that the results are already coming through. This year, we are treating more patients than ever before.

At the same time the National Health Service manpower is being properly controlled. In direct response to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East, the proportion of front-line staff, especially doctors and nurses, is increasing. That, again, is one of the things which should be achieved from a manpower policy.

This year we expect to achieve improvements in efficiency which will release something like £120 million for use in the service. Moreover, I have just approved the health authorities' plans for the coming financial year. As part of our arrangements for management in the Health Service, we now require health authorities to draw up short-term programmes every year. Those programmes set out their plans for developing services in the coming year. I have now approved the plans for 1986-87. Those plans show that health authorities are planning a significant expansion in services. They will treat more patients, make more advanced forms of treatment available, and continue the progress already being made towards caring for people in the community. The plans build on the progress that has been made in recent years.

Since 1978-79, an extra 17·5 per cent. in real terms has already been provided for hospital and community health services. In the coming year an extra £650 million—6·7 per cent.—is being provided against forecast general inflation of 4·5 per cent.

It is also significant that the steps that we have taken to improve management are now beginning to pay off in this respect. Health authorities are planning to generate cash savings of £150 million in the coming year through a wide variety of value-for-money measures. Those measures include energy conservation, better management of supplies, and competitive tendering for support services. All of that £150 million will be retained by health authorities.

Health authorities will also be making better use of manpower. In the next year, overall numbers are unlikely to change much, but again there will be an increase in staff working directly with patients. Most of those staff, to stress the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East, will be nurses.

The progress being made in developing the services can perhaps best be illustrated in three ways. First, total capital spending will be over £900 million in the coming year compared with £365 million in 1978-79. Next year's figures include an estimated £130 million of receipts from the sales of land and property which the health authorities will be able to retain.

Secondly, we shall continue the move towards community care for the mentally handicapped and other groups of patients. That means, for example, that in the northern region, by July 1986 only four children will still be in mental handicap hospitals, and in South-East Thames region, no children will be in such hospitals by March 1987. That is entirely good news and should be welcomed on both sides of the House.

Thirdly, all regions are also planning important developments in their acute services. They expect the total number of patients treated to rise significantly over the next 12 months and to make progress in the provision of priority services. For example, coronary artery surgery and renal dialysis will be expanded, there will be more hip and joint replacement operations, and a children's bone marrow transplant unit will open in Bristol.

Whatever differences there may be in the House about Health Service policy, one fact remains. The aim must be to use resources to their maximum effect. The Health Service is about providing the best possible services for patients and good management is about achieving that aim. It is not some alien concept. It is a common sense policy aimed at providing the best possible service, for patients, and as such it deserves the support of the House.

11.4 am

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Like other hon. Members, I congratulate the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) on his choice of subject today. I am not sure whether his description of the pressures put upon him to enter the ballot are quite accurate, knowing the hon. Gentleman's propensity for tongue in cheek. Nevertheless, I am glad that he did enter the ballot, and chose this subject.

The hon. Member for Oxford, East, is one of the best Conservative Members at walking the tightrope. At times during his speech he wobbled too far towards the Government, but with a few variations of pace towards the end of his speech, he almost reached the opposite pillar. We welcome that as well.

I also enjoyed being part of the Select Committee on Social Services with the hon. Member for Oxford, East, and the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Renée Short), who spoke earlier, when we produced the report on Griffiths. I still think that the conclusions and recommendations of the report stand up to examination in the light of the experience so far.

[Mr. Michael Meadowcroft]

It would be possible to summarise the present position with Griffiths as a report conceived in hope, born in doubt, and nurtured with some worry. The representations that all of us have had today will demonstrate that. The hon. Member for Oxford, East quoted a popular song at the end of his speech. There is another popular song which I think that the Government sometimes employ too much, and that is "Wishing will make it so". I sometimes think that the Government embarked on their proposals with that song in mind. I will refrain from giving hon. Members the refrain.

Today's representations are important, as they tend to come mainly from the nursing sector, and the particular focus of the debate has been on the problems faced by nurses. However, if we concentrate solely on that matter, we would ignore some of the more general aspects of management and the control and accountability which are more fundamental to this topic.

Nevertheless, the facts are that, so far, very few nurses have been appointed. Indeed, it is not surprising that the proportion of nurses appointed as one goes down the scale from region, to district, to unit, will be greater. It is also not surprising, alas, in this male-dominated world of ours, that the proportion of men appointed at the nursing level is higher than the proportion of men within the nursing profession. That is a commentary on the present position.

The feeling in the nursing profession is summarised in a letter to me from an official of the Royal College of Nursing in the city of Leeds in my constituency. In that letter I received a copy of the Seacroft and Killingbeck hospital unit general manager's proposals, which say:

"As you can see, there is no one between the Charge Nurse and the U.G.M. other than Consultants, so that money could be allocated to medical propositions while the staff closest to the patients have no line of complaint."

That is the fear in the nursing profession. I am sure that the Secretary of State would say that there are lines of complaint which may not necessarily be within the nursing profession, but it may be too narrow a view to suggest that; or the Secretary of State may say that the designated nurse adviser is the person to go to.

It is the feeling that is important, because so often when one deals with a large organisation and personal services appearance is as important as reality. Unless people feel that they are part and parcel of the system, they are unlikely to accept the mechanics of that system. The feeling is that no one understands the problems that nurses already have. Therefore, there is a depth of feeling that what is happening is dangerously wrong at the point at which the service is delivered to the patient.

Another great concern of the nursing profession is about what they regard as the hasty amalgamation of units. I accept what the hon. Member for Oxford, East said, that to amalgamate is not necessarily bad, and that there are occasions, with changing circumstances and perceptions of care, when to amalgamate into larger units may be better. On the other hand, the opposite is equally true: to amalgamate for the sake of it may not improve things at all. The figures show a drop in amalgamations of almost a third, from 850 to 600. That is alarming.

That means that there will be a lot more split sites and more shared equipment. We all know the worst example of that—someone who thought that he could share a defibrillator between separated units. That piece of equipment was peculiarly required in an emergency. I suspect that changes on that scale occur in every organisation, whatever the Government may wish to say to the contrary. The problem with nurses is that they are the most vulnerable and open to exploitation by management systems. During the NHS strike, the nurses kept the service going, stood up to the pressures on them, and were most open to exploitation from outside.

I hope that the Minister will take on board the feelings of those within the nursing profession, and not simply counter them by saying, "The structure is there and the people are in place to cope with the need," but will somehow inspire confidence in the proposals so that nurses feel part and parcel of the structure.

The two most important matters with which Griffiths was said to deal were how one made a decision when there were disagreements about which policy should be followed, and how to ensure speedy action. Every system must have a way of sorting out disagreements, and not all systems will prove to have speedy action. Sometimes we look for speedy action rather than seek to understand what the action should be. There is no point in speedy action for its own sake. The electorate, for example, wants less talk and more action. Throughout the decades, our policies in housing with excessive action without proper discussion about what we wanted were disastrously wrong. Speedy action of itself is not necessarily a criterion to follow.

I stress that these are not exclusively management problems. To try to contain them in a box marked "management" is dangerous and contrary to the sort of service that we wish to develop. The management of such delicate and important services, for example, involves accountability and decisions about resource allocation which cannot be contained within a unit, district or region. Those decisions are taken, bearing in mind the power to raise the funds as well as to spend them. It is essentially a political problem within the NHS, and every political problem requires a political solution. Problems of politics cannot be resolved mechanically. The danger is that we separate the problem and say that it is a management problem, which I do not believe to be true.

If there was a proper political solution to the structure of the NHS, management decisions would follow much more easily. The separation of responsibility between the Government and the NHS, and local government and social services has demonstrated that there is far less linkage between the different services and separate authorities than there should be. We have joint consultative arrangements and many other structures which detract from the perception of management being an entirely separate body. That type of political problem causes great difficulty.

Mr. Pavitt: Is the hon. Gentleman advocating that reorganisation number four should take the whole NHS into local government, as is the case with education?

Mr. Meadowcroft: I shall come to that. I am not in the business merely of providing problems.

The root of the problem from the Government's point of view is their obsession not merely with management but with control. They adhere to the fallacy that central administration from London to the regions, districts and units is somehow efficient of itself. I do not believe for one moment that that is true. The problems of scale are immense and contrary to the efficiency of a service and the sensitivity with which it is administered. I am pleased that the motion carefully talks about efficiency, effectiveness and sympathetic management. Those three characteristics must go together. The desire for central control is dangerous if one seeks sympathetic management.

The Government are obsessed with uniformity, and think that if there are to be general managers in one area there must be general managers everywhere. The hon. Member for Oxford, East said that the problem with the renewal of a fixed contract depends on whether one's face fits and whether one is popular. The same is true of the chairman of the health authority, and that these are important and powerful considerations in deciding whether to reappoint him. I do not believe that that is so. The hon. Gentleman drew attention to the changing role of authority members, and I am glad that at present he is not being too distracted. It is important to consider the implications and knock-on effects of changes in management.

Similarly, what happens with district authority chairmen is important to the whole structure because it affects the way in which the chain is implemented all the way down. In my region three of the district health authority chairs have unfortunately not been reappointed.

Mrs. Renée Short: The hon. Gentleman is lucky that it is only three.

Mr. Meadowcroft: The same problem was dealt with in The Guardian yesterday. The chairman of the west Lambeth health authority, who resigned, was quoted as saying:

"I was told by two senior Conservatives that Central Office was vetting all candidates in London and the South-east for the chairmanship of health authorities because they wanted a smooth ride during the run-up to the general election."

That is not conducive to sympathetic management. If a chairman is worried about whether he will be reappointed, how on earth can he deal properly with staff management? The position is intolerable, and is focused particularly on management. In Yorkshire, for example, the person chosen by the other chairs to be the district representative has now been set aside. It means that if one says unpopular things, one's future may be in doubt. That is dangerous.

I do not think that the problem involves either general management or consensus, as if the two were mutually exclusive. Any general manager who does not have a large measure of consensus is doomed to fail, and any consensus arrangement which does not have a way of resolving disagreements with some efficiency is also doomed to fail. It is extremely artificial to pretend that the two are mutually exclusive.

Similarly, the question of defining efficiency is artificial. Some people may define a system as efficient, if it is run on military principles. Indeed, some people from the military have been appointed. Stories are told with amusement and mild horror about the way in which some ex-military general managers sit down with something like a chess board and try to move the pieces about without understanding the consequences. The hon. Gentleman said that it was useful to have a director who knew where the factory was, but I always understood that the managing director knew where the factory was. If the general manager is not in tune and aware of where everything is and of the different pressures within the system, no amount of efficient management in the Government's terms will solve the problem.

The heart of the problem is that, if one separates the power to tax from the power to spend, one will always have problems. Strangely enough, one of the key documents about politics in the NHS was produced by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), following his experience as Minister of Health. Two short quotations from "Medicine and Politics" are relevant. The right hon. Gentleman said:

"the constitutional principle (is) that the proceeds of taxation must be expended by those who are responsible to the representatives of the taxpayers."

He said of the boards that are appointed by the Government:

"They are, directly or indirectly, the Minister's appointees. They must obey his instructions. They have no independent authority derived from any other source, such as a local electorate, which could put them in direct relationship with the public. They have, for practical purposes, no independent sources of revenue, but spend what the Minister allocates to them."

That is the difference.

The right hon. Gentleman also compared the NHS unfavourably with local government social services, and spotted the point that the latter are locally accountable for the service and must stand up in a public forum and defend their decisions because they both raise and spend the money. Once that is separated, as is the case with health authorities, no amount of obsession with Griffiths and efficient management will get us out of the problem.

If we are to deal with the problems of accountability and uniformity, different general experiments must be adapted to different methods. The Select Committee recommended that there should be some experimentation before we launch the report's recommendations everywhere, and to see what advantages there are. Why is there uniformity in the regions rather than variation? Why can we not have experiments within the district health authorities with local government? The district health authorities are now conterminous with local county boundaries. Uniformity is not displayed in every other service.

When we were debating the fluoridation of water, we discovered that, for example, in Scotland water is not controlled by appointed water boards but is part of the regional councils. If it can be done elsewhere, why can it not be done in the Health Service? There do not have to be general managers everywhere.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am listening carefully to what the hon. Member is saying and I am trying to understand the recommendations he is seeking to put forward. He is suggesting that the power to tax and the power to spend ideally should not be separated. He is complaining that we are seeking—I do not accept it—to control from the centre. Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that there should be a local tax paid to some sort of local health authority? Does he wish to devolve local taxation and break up the Health Service into separate entities?

Mr. Meadowcroft: The Minister stopped me in my purple passage. I do not want to see regional assemblies. I want to see regional authorities with the power to tax and the power to control services which are clearly regional.

We already have regional government in Britain. In Leeds, there is a massive tower block, City house, which contains the civil servants who are the regional government for Yorkshire and Humberside. They are controlled from London, but I want the control to be in Yorkshire and Humberside. There is no intrinsic reason why one cannot have regional government in Britain with the power to tax exactly where the power of spending is centred. That gets around the problem of control and the problem of uniformity.

[Mr. Meadowcroft]

The democratically elected, accountable authorities will be able to decide what they want. Management in a truly elected forum would have the immense advantage of multi-purpose authority, not confined solely to the National Health Service, however large, but linked to other personal social services, one that has links with other nursing services within the local authority. That would thus enable us to have management which, in the words of the hon. Member for Oxford, East, is effective, efficient and sympathetic. That is what I wish to achieve, but I suspect that it will not be achieved by simply isolating the management in the way the Government have done.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): I believe that the Griffiths report and its adoption are landmarks in the National Health Service. Like any other organisation, the NHS cannot stand still, and it must develop.

The NHS is big business, both in the sense of the number of employees and in the sense of its budget. I am sure that Griffiths was right when he said that the NHS needed management structures and techniques. The NHS is not big business in the sense that it is a profit-making concern, such as Marks and Spencer, a petroleum company or, indeed, the grocery company from which Mr. Griffiths came. However, the NHS is certainly comparable with those organisations in size and complexity. It therefore needs management.

The National Health Service is basically a health service or, perhaps more accurately, an illness, disease and injury service. It provides medical and nursing care, but it also provides catering, laundering, cleaning and general administration services, and one has to consider also the financial aspects of its work. Each hospital can be said to be a community in itself.

Any organisation of such complexity needs management. This House, a complex organisation, has a board of management. The National Health Service is larger than many industrial and commercial concerns, but it is not different in its needs. The NHS covers many disciplines. As in commerce and industry, management can be drawn from a wide range of disciplines. In commerce and industry some engineers make good managers, but some do not. The same applies to accountants, marketing men and so on. Surely it is sensible in the NHS that managers should be drawn from a wide range of disciplines—doctors, nurses, pathologists, treasurers and administrators.

We must realise that not only are we introducing a new philosophy to a wide range of people—many of whom are rugged individuals—but we are introducing new ideas to people who will be fundamentally affected by their implementation. The prospects of people in the National Health Service are at stake in the way in which Griffiths is implemented. Naturally people are concerned about whether to apply for management posts, or to accept that they will find themselves answering to managers with whom it will be congenial to work.

What is surprising is not that there have been some grumbles and problems in implementing the Griffiths report, but that they have been so few. It was inevitable that there would be problems and misunderstanding.

Nurses, or, to be more precise, the Royal College of Nursing—I do not know how representative the college is on this issue—has been waging a campaign which appears to show that when the managers have been appointed at various levels, nurses have not been appointed. That is what the RCN is complaining about. When one begins to ask questions, one discovers that relatively few nurses have actually applied for management positions. In fact, in a number of instances nurses have been appointed to management positions. Although the RCN claims that there is a problem, it admits that it is perhaps only in certain areas and that it is not a national issue.

I do not dispute that nurses can be good managers, but it seems unnecessary to assume that every manager should be a nurse. As I understand it, even though nurses may not hold a management position, they are represented on management groups. Nurses have written to me in support of the campaign. I have asked them specifically whether they can give any instances where nurses are not able to make an adequate contribution to management decisions. If they had been able to furnish me with such details, I would have been happy to present them to the Minister. I can only say that I am still waiting for that information.

I do not say that the RCN campaign is without justification, but I think that its campaign has been grossly overplayed. I contrast the RCN with the British Medical Association, with which I have from time to time crossed swords. The BMA has not always been satisfied on the issue of management. It believes, quite understandably, that doctors should have an input in management decisions. However, it insists that the management structures are correct.

Each district management board, writes the BMA,

"or the equivalent body which has succeeded the District Management Team, should include three doctors: a hospital consultant, a general practitioner and a community physician. Proposed structures which were wrong have been challenged by the BMA. Over 50 structures were initially unacceptable; most have been modified and the BMA continues to ensure that the remainder are satisfactory. Similar monitoring is being carried out at unit level."

That is a sensible way in which to proceed.

It is far too soon for us to pass judgment on Griffiths. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, we are only at the beginning of the process, but it is useful for us to watch developments carefully. It is one thing to monitor developments, and another to interfere. The Government, having introduced the Griffiths recommendations, must let the health authorities get on with it. Naturally, my right hon. Friend will want to give guidance on how it should be done, but, having given that guidance, it should be left at that. I speak with some feeling because my local health authority of Bromley took the lead in contracting out for various services, but then found itself in dispute with the Department when it started to do things in its own way.

The Secretary of State has overall responsibility for the NHS, but I urge him to leave district health authorities to get on with the job, to organise themselves and to make appointments in accordance with local needs and conditions and with minimal interference. Meanwhile, it is valuable that the House has the opportunity to discuss these matters, and it is indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) for giving us that opportunity.

11.32 am

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): I congratulate the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) on initiating this debate. He obviously speaks with much authority and experience in these matters, and I detected in his well-informed speech considerable reserve about the Government's proposals in this context. No Labour Member would complain about that.

We have been told that the Secretary of State has other appointments and has had to leave, and we understand that. However, I object, as I have done on previous occasions, to his selective use of facts to persuade the country as whole as to the improvement of the quality and extent of Health Service provision over the past five or six years. The hon. Member widened the debate to make party political points, and I too want to widen the debate to make my riposte.

I objected very much to Secretary of State's reference to the "skill and dedication" of all staff. That point is made repeatedly, but it does not butter any parsnips with the people who are on the receiving end. The low pay, among vast sections of employees in the Health Service, is well known. Indeed, when the Prime Minister talks about the incidence of income tax, she refers to a nurse on £140 a week having at least 30 per cent. of that deducted in tax. She cites the nurse as a low-paid employee, so it is no good talking about the skill and dedication of these people unless one is prepared to link that with adequate pay.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South) rose——

Mr. Hamilton: I shall give way later on, because I now want to give some specific examples.

The fine words used by the Secretary of State are far removed from what we see happening all round the country—crumbling hospitals, peeling paint, inadequate maintenance, closing wards and hospitals — all these things are happening, and everybody knows it. The specific point of the debate is the Griffiths report. The House knows that I am sponsored as a Member by the Confederation of Health Service Employees. [Interruption.] The Minister need not say "Ah" as if that is a great revelation. I reveal it whenever I speak in such a debate.

COHSE warned about the dangers of the Griffiths propositions about two years ago, but not until the Royal College of Nursing began its campaign did the Ministry see fit to send a circular letter to hon. Members, dated 21 January 1986. That letter was designed, if not to rubbish, at least to defuse and downgrade the nursing unions' campaign against the ways in which the Griffiths report recommendations were being implemented.

That letter was for Members to circulate in case they got representations from the RCN. If the hon. Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) got a copy, no doubt he sent it to the unions. He would have been wise not do so because that letter sought to show, through the usual jargon, that the whole purpose of the exercise was to give patients a better service. Always, when the Government interfere and meddle with the Health Service, in one way or another, they end with a certain expression — it is all designed "to give the patients a better service".

The second aim was to give the patients an increased voice in and influence on the standard and services in our hospitals. We have heard not a murmur about the second claim in the debate so far, and it is difficult to see how Griffiths and its implementation would achieve that aim, even supposing that it achieved the first. I dispute that it would achieve the first either. However, the implications of the letter seem to be that the RCN and COHSE do not want to give patients those things, or that the machinery that exists does not enable them to do so. That is absurd, insulting and inaccurate.

The way in which the Griffiths proposals are working has the nurses — particularly the nurses, but also the doctors — angry and unhappy, to use no stronger language. The implementation is further forward in England and Wales than it is in Scotland. As a Scottish Member, it was with some trepidation that I decided to speak in the debate because, although Griffiths did not refer to Scotland, the Secretary of State for Scotland made it clear at the outset that he would follow the general propositions outlined by Griffiths for management. Therefore, Scotland is to some extent lagging behind England in the implementation of the proposals.

I shall now examine why unhappiness and anxiety exist among the nurses and the doctors. It is not because the nurses have any selfish self-interest. I suspect that, to some extent, the doctors are motivated by that, but the idea that the nurses are peddling their self-interest is too laughable even to contemplate. They are worried and anxious because they suspect—I put it no higher than that—that their role is being eroded and downgraded, and the management of health care is being put into other hands.

I referred to the proposition that the Confederation of Health Service Employees, my sponsoring union, put forward in November 1983. It predicted then that nurses would be squeezed out of NHS management and that the voice of nurses would be ignored as the Government installed hand-picked managers to carry out the Government's plans. The so-called new and thrusting, super-efficient, cost-conscious managers have already brought about a situation in which it is envisaged that there will be no nursing managers above ward sister grade and that directors of nursing education will be responsible to somebody in the personnel department.

Most of the top jobs have already gone either to existing NHS administrators or to outside business men who have been baited with salaries of up to £45,000 a year. As has repeatedly been stated in the debate, only a small proportion of those jobs have gone to doctors, nurses or medical officers. The figures were given in the Health and Social Services Journal of 12 September 1985 and they were quoted by the hon. Member for Oxford, East.

The claim has been made repeatedly that there are singularly few women, if any, among them. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Oxford, East has the exact figures of how many women applied, but the fact that they do not apply shows that there is something wrong, somewhere, with the system. The promised good mix of experience from the private sector and the public sector has not been realised. Although the Secretary of State for Social Services claimed that such a mix has occurred, it is minimal. Over 80 per cent. of the top jobs have gone to existing top NHS staff, and four fifths of that total have gone to administrators.

Interestingly enough, nearly six out of every 100 jobs have gone to ex-military personnel. The health authorities cannot attract good quality men from private business because of the salary levels offered. The hon. Member for Oxford, East said that one of the reasons why some men will not come into the NHS is that the health authorities cannot match the salaries that they are already getting in private industry. But the military man, the Royal Air Force man, the Army man of 50 who comes out of the services with a good pension presents no pay problem. He already has a moonlighting job. No, it is not a moonlighting job, but he has another income. Therefore, he can afford to take the relatively low salary that the health authorities can offer.

No problems are involved, either, in transferring such people's pensions from the private to the public sector. However, even if the health authorities have followed the correct procedures, a meddling Minister has vetoed some appointments for reasons that have not always been made clear. In the meantime, many health authorities have abolished the post of director of nursing as well as the post of chief nursing officer. This means that nurses will no longer manage nursing and that they will be excluded from decision making.

I wish to say a few words about Scotland. I make no complaint about the absence this morning of a Scottish Minister, because I gave no warning that I intended to speak in this debate. However, it is worth putting it on record that very few Scots believe the Tory claim that the National Health Service is safe in their hands. The vast majority of Scots are deeply suspicious of any proposed reorganisation by the Government, whether in the Health Service, local government or any other sphere.

The Government's claim that the aims of the Griffiths proposals are better care for patients and more participation by them in decision taking gives rise to hoots of derisive disbelief in Scotland. Nobody denies that public money must be spent efficiently and with adequate accountability at all levels. There will be consensus about that both in this House and outside Parliament. The National Health Service cannot be excluded from the exercise of the disciplines and restraints that ensure that those aims are achieved. However, it is interesting—the Scots have commented on this—that the propositions relating to National Health Service management came from Mr. Griffiths, who is the deputy chairman and managing director of a big supermarket, Sainsburys.

The reaction of the Scottish TUC is typical of the rest of the country: that we simply cannot look at the turnover of patients in hospitals in the same way as we look at the turnover of tins of baked beans in a supermarket like Sainsburys. Nurses cannot be treated, either, as though they were of as little account as shop assistants in Sainsburys or Marks and Spencer, although that seems to be happening. The National Health Service is not a supermarket. It is concerned with providing the best possible service to patients. That cannot always be measured in money terms. It cannot always be shown in a profit and loss account. It never is and it never can be. It is not concerned with those things.

The National Health Service as a whole is a complex web of interacting disciplines, skills and interests. The present structure might sound conservative, but it allows those different interests to be represented and heard. It is absurd to pretend that one can select a general manager at each level and expect him gladly and willingly to be accepted by doctors, nurses, technicians, administrators and ancillary workers. That is the meaning of consensus. So many complex interests are at work that this can be organised only on the basis of consensus. To appoint a general manager at each and every level makes the achievement of consensus, in my view, that much more difficult.

A few weeks ago — for the first time, to my knowledge — the Scottish area of the British Medical Association invited Labour Members of Parliament to a working dinner at Tavistock square at which they voiced their grave misgivings about these matters. There was an element of special pleading, but they made the important point that the people who know best how the National Health Service works, what makes it tick and how to achieve maximum consensus and co-operation are the people at the sharp end—those who know it from the inside. The view was expressed, which we accepted, that when they are in position the general managers of Scottish health boards will have, among their other responsibilities, an overall responsibility for strategic objectives and allocating resources. In discharging those functions those general managers will be accountable to the Scottish Home and Health Department in Edinburgh and not to the local health boards.

Since the appointments are also within the effective control of the Government, it means, in effect, that the control of the Health Service will effectively be transferred to the Government as, increasingly, local government has been transferred to the Government. That, along with the various other reconstructions of the Health Service over the past decade, make it understandable that morale at all levels in the Health Service is at its lowest since the inception of the Health Service. Can anyone wonder, at a time when young City slickers can obtain salaries of £100,000-plus and conscientious skilled hospital workers are paid in peanuts?

I return to the claim made by the Secretary of State about the skill and dedication of the workers in the Health Service. A trained hospital cardiographer, after 34 years at the same hospital, earns a basic salary of £98·63 a week. That is at the top of the scale, after 10 years of service. Going through the range of ancillary workers' pay—I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) had an Adjournment debate earlier this morning on the same matter—we find basic wage rates as little as £67 a week before stoppages. A dental technician starts at £5,636 a year—£108 a week gross. Medical laboratory scientific staff start at £115 a week, or thereabouts. A medical secretary receives £89 a week. A general staff nurse—the linchpin of the ward, highly trained and hard working—receives basic pay of £115 a week gross. It costs the Secretary of State not a penny to compliment them on their skill and dedication. It is the pay scales that count.

I quote in conclusion the 14th report of the Committee of Public Accounts on the control of nursing manpower. On page ix, paragraph 22 says:

> "We were particularly concerned about the high rate of loss to the NHS of both qualified nurses and those under training. In addition to the obvious loss of the value for money, the prospect of a future shortage of nurses, both qualified and in training, is a most serious matter of direct importance to patients."

That is very different from the picture painted by the Secretary of State today.

Paragraph 15 of the report says:

"the current shortages in the mentally ill and mentally handicapped areas . . . have occurred despite overall increases in numbers, and that some hospitals are finding it difficult to maintain standards."

That is the reality of the situation today and, much as we want increased efficiency and more steps taken to ensure that we receive value for money at all stages — that applies in every department throughout the economy; there is nothing novel about that — I am of the view, which I think is shared by many people throughout Britain, not least in Scotland, that those ends will not be achieved by the Government's proposals.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): May I add my congratulations to those of my hon. Friends to my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) not only on winning the ballot but on seeking to introduce a subject of such considerable importance of which he has such expertise? My hon. Friend has come a long way since we were at school together in Liverpool. These days he is very much the sort of person from whom one would buy a used car. Indeed, I hope to do so soon.

It has been mentioned that my hon. Friend served on the Select Committee on Social Services, but I believe that his expertise on the Health Service comes from his long membership of a health authority. Indeed, I think that he is still vice-chairman of the health authority on which he has served with much distinction for a number of years. In that, I imagine that he would regard himself as lucky. I always feel sorry that I had to give up being chairman of my health authority, as it was an office of profit, in order to come to the House, and I have often missed it.

I should like to nail another argument that we have heard today. The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) has now left the Chamber, leaving the alliance Benches in their true glory — completely unrepresented — but that is nothing new. The hon. Gentleman talked about uniformity, but I did not quite understand his argument. He rightly said that as the health authorities spend taxpayers' money, those who run them should be responsible to the Minister. To me, that is an argument for uniformity throughout the country. The hon. Gentleman then went on to say that uniformity was a bad thing and that we should have regional boards, which is what I thought we had already. That was an argument against uniformity. The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways, although perhaps as a member of the alliance party—or parties—that is what he wants.

The hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) referred to low-paid staff, especially nurses. If he is as concerned as he says — and as I am sure he is — he should jump on to two other important bandwagons. The first, on which many of us are trying to ride, seeks to reduce the amount of tax and national insurance contributions that low-paid people have to pay so that they can take home what they earn. I believe that the hon. Gentleman's figures related to take-home pay. He should be aware that those people earn a little more than that and we should like them to have that money.

The other bandwagon seeks to improve the family income supplement and family credit system. It does no credit to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) that he has consistently voted against those proposals in the Standing Committee on the Social Security Bill. The proposals are intended not only to bring in a more generous family support scheme for low-paid people in work who have families, but to ensure that the money is paid in their pay packets far more quickly than at present. I welcome that scheme, and I believe that it will be of the greatest help to low-paid staff.

The hon. Member for Fife, Central speaks for the Confederation of Health Service Employees. I put it to him that hospital cleaners will never be well paid, but they do essential work and we should join together to ensure that they at least take home 100 per cent. of the money that they earn.

Mr. Corbyn: Why not pay them a decent wage?

Mrs. Currie: There is no point in paying them more if it simply disappears in tax.

It has been argued that Britain spends less than many other countries on its health services. I have looked at the OECD figures for percentages of GDP which were published recently. Those figures go back to 1960, but I have gone back to 1955. The percentage spent by the United Kingdom is certainly lower than that spent in other countries—about 6·2 per cent. compared with 10·8 per cent. in the United States, 9·3 per cent. in France, and so on. But even in the earliest years of the National Health Service that was so. The United Kingdom has always been behind the United States, Germany, France, Canada, Australia, Austria, Italy, and so on. Moreover, as those countries have become richer, the gap has widened. If there was ever an indictment of Britain's relative economic decline in the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s, it is that those countries have been spending a relatively greater proportion of an absolutely larger amount on health care. Nevertheless, the United Kingdom has steadily devoted a larger percentage of GDP to health care. The figure was 3·9 per cent. in 1960; it is now 6·2 per cent.; and I am delighted to report that under the first Tory Government of the 1980s the gap between this country and the OECD average has at last begun to close.

Presumably, we are talking about public expenditure on health. I imagine that the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) will seek to make this point in speaking for the Opposition, so I will unmake it before he starts. In fact, the United Kingdom shows up a great deal better in this respect because many countries devote a high proportion of private funds — personal, trade union and company funds — to health. Health staff in those countries, therefore, include billing, credit and invoicing staff and others who do not devote their time to the care of patients. When that is taken into account, some nine OECD countries devote a lower percentage of GDP than the United Kingdom to health care. In some cases, the percentage is far worse. Some of the countries that come out worse than the United Kingdom on this ground are eminently respectable and health-conscious nations, such as Australia, New Zealand, Finland, Japan and the United States.

Of the 10·8 per cent. of all resources devoted to health care in the United States in 1983, only 4·5 per cent. came from public resources. In Japan, 6·7 per cent. of all resources went to health care, with 5 per cent. coming from public funds. In the United Kingdom, 5·5 per cent. of the resources devoted to health care come from public funds, so we are not doing too badly. Indeed, we are doing a great deal better than some much wealthier nations.

I shall pick up some of the comments made——

Dr. M. S. Miller: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you rule on the difference between the copious use of notes and direct reading from a brief?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): The hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) is making use of notes, and that is in order.

Mrs. Currie: I am most surprised by the intervention of the hon. Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller), who knows so much about health care. I am sure that he is well aware that it is exceedingly dangerous to quote figures without having the figures in front of one. I am extremely careful to get figures right.

Many of the criticisms of the Griffiths report are well founded, and it has never been pretended that the report has all the answers. It is worth saying that not all general managers are in post. I think that my right hon. and hon. Friends in the DHSS have estimated that not all general managers will be in post until May or June. We cannot expect to have all the results of the implementation of the Griffiths report at this stage. We have been reorganising the Health Service since 1981, and those of us who were involved in that process in 1981 will recall the hours, days and months that were spent interviewing applicants for the posts that had been created. We spent many hours discussing structures, followed by further hours rediscussing the new structures. We consulted all the various interests. I remember going through six rounds of interviews for the district medical officer position. It was one of the positions that had not been filled during the 1970s. When I had authority, I knew exactly what I wanted. However, it was necessary, because the DMO was to be employed by the NHS, to pass through all the ring fences that the trade unions had forced on the NHS and which those in charge of the service had been foolish enough to accept instead of having open competition. However, we ended up with the chap we wanted.

Under the Griffiths report the whole business has started all over again. Officers have been reinterviewed, and in many instances they have been paid £2,000 or £3,000 more for undertaking exactly the same job. I cannot see that we have benefited to such an enormous extent from reorganisation after reorganisation. This is the fifth successive year of economic growth and of reorganising the Health Service.

Dr. Marek: I must ask the hon. Lady who brought about the various reorganisations. I am glad that she takes the view that the Griffiths report does not have all the answers. On 20 November 1985 the Minister for Health wrote a letter to the chairmen of regional health authorities, part of which stated:

"I do not wish to give the impression that this is a widespread problem or"—

this is the important part—

"that we would favour any derogation from the fundamentals of the Griffiths approach."

If the hon. Lady thinks that the Griffiths report does not have all the answers, perhaps she should talk to the Minister for Health.

Mrs. Currie: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree with me that my right hon. and hon. Friends in the DHSS are capable of answering that sort of question themselves. My views on the Griffiths report are on record in the debate on the report which took place some time ago. I said then that I doubted whether it had all the answers. It would be foolish to say that one reorganisation can produce all the answers. The reorganisation was introduced by a Government who have tried extremely hard to get things right in the Health Service and who have devoted more resources to it than any other previous Government. If that has led to any particular feelings on my part, it is a fear of reorganisation, and that fear has carried over to some of last suggestions which have been made in the dark hours of the night about education vouchers. We should beware of political panaceas. Reorganisations postpone the resolution of problems that do not go away. They make the resolution of problems harder as they divert resources and effort.

I had lunch recently with a splendid gentleman who took my place as the chairman of the Midlands health authority. I was delighted to hear that he still faces the same problems, which I felt reinforced my judgment of them, but I was sad to hear that they had not been resolved.

One of my suspicions about reorganisation and some of the arguments that have been advanced during the debate is that we tend to regard better management as an objective. Some of the comments of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State tended towards that. There is a tendency to see better management as an objective, but it is a means to an end, not an end in itself. The objective is better health care. But, as always in such debates, we seem to be concentrating on input instead of output, or the results. Good management is merely the method by which we achieve those results. The evidence of good management is the more efficient use of resources for better health. I think that we are seeing that now. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State quoted all the figures for more treatment, more patients, and so on. The fact that people are living longer and that 95 per cent. of our people have enough confidence always to use the NHS is proof of its success.

I shall give some figures to illustrate the efficiency of the NHS and of its management. They come from page 72 of The Economist of 8 June 1985. I hope that the hon. Member for East Kilbride will not mind if I refer, occasionally, to my papers. They show the comparative cost of transplants in the United Kingdom and the United States of America, which is, by any standard, the wealthiest country in the world and spends the most on health care. In the United Kingdom a heart transplant costs about one third of the price in the United States. A heart and lung transplant—one of the most advanced forms of surgery — also costs about one third of the price in America. The same is true of liver transplants. A pancreatic transplant is about half the cost of a similar transplant in America, as is a kidney transplant. Moreover, a bone marrow transplant probably costs five times more in America than in the United Kingdom. Thus, although the United States is devoting many more resources to health care, we achieve better health care out of the money that we are able to spend. The results speak for themselves.

I turn to the campaign run by the Royal College of Nursing and to some of the disgraceful remarks made by nurse administrators and senior nursing trade unionists about the Griffiths report and its implementation.

An advertisement in New Society of 24 January 1986 shows a picture of Florence Nightingale and a picture of a modern nurse. It says:

splendid Miss Nightingale from Derby—

"established British nursing standards. The nurse on the right is being forced to compromise them . . . because, whilst we agree that administrators can run hospitals, we don't believe that they can run nursing. More and more Health Authorities are appointing executives: at the same time, they are depriving nurses of any meaningful management role."

There is nothing to prevent nurses from applying for such posts. But they do not do so, because they like nursing, being on the wards, and being involved in patient care. They look at the general management job and realise that they like what they are doing. For much the same reason, all the capable ladies in the real world, the councillors, magistrates, head mistresses, and so on, look at the House of Commons and decide that they do not want to go there. One sometimes wonders who is right.

There is nothing whatever to prevent nurses from applying. In recent weeks, the nursing press has been full of horror stories, such as the story that 70 or 100 applications were received for general management posts, although only one had come from a nurse. Too seldom do nurses make any real effort to become good managers, even of nurses. I know of horror stories concerning senior nurse managers during the 1981 reorganisation. I asked one such person what the turnover of trained nurses was in his hospital. He did not know. When I sent him to find out, he came back with a scribbled bit of paper. But he should have been asking that sort of question, he should have had the information to hand, and he should have been acting on it. It was not right that someone should have had to come in and probe like that. But too seldom do nurses make the effort to make good managers and too seldom do they have any real knowledge of what other skills and professions can do. In other words, they suffer from exactly the same problems of ignorance of other professions as they criticise in others.

The Health Service needs the best managers that it can lay its hands on, and I do not much care which discipline they come from. That being so, some general managers will not be nurses. I am surprised that the RCN cannot find anything better to do than knock its colleagues. If it really wants to go back to the days of Florence Nightingale, it is talking about going back to the days of nurses working 100 hours a week, scrubbing ward floors on their knees and having to resign when they got married. I am not sure that I would want that.

One of our aims with Griffiths was to bring in outsiders. If there has been any failure, that is the one that we have to admit because, as reported in a written answer of 5 February 1986, we managed to find all of 35 outsiders out of 423 unit general managers. That is fewer than the nurses. Many are not industrial people, but have come in from the service.

I found an article by an industrialist called Lorne Williamson, who, for his sins, is the district general manager for the Brent health authority. I hope that he is enjoying it in Brent. I am sure that the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) will be acquainted with him. It is interesting to read his criticisms of the Health Service. He commented on the public scrutiny with which they work. That strikes everybody who enters the NHS. One cannot do a thing without everybody taking an exceedingly keen interest and criticising absolutely everything. He said:

"I feel like I am managing in a goldfish bowl."

That will not go away, and it will not attract industrial managers.

Mr. Williamson's second criticism is of the lack of agreed objectives. He speaks of the enormous verbiage of the NHS and mourns the absence of monthly quantitative measures of performance. That reflects the fact that there are not any real objectives. He comments on the literacy and articulateness of senior staff and their relative innumeracy. We may have a problem there. I suspect that he is right.

The third criticism was that the absence of any kind of incentive for performance is striking. He wrote that, as a result,

"delays seldom have cost penalties and frequently bring positive benefits!"

We have to devise a system for giving incentives for good management. We tried to do it in local government, but I suspect that we have halted that recently. If we are to encourage good management, we have to take such criticism. Mr. Williamson does not mention the biggest pressure of all on the NHS and its administrators—the fact that there is always a budget limit but that expectations are infinite. The public are never satisfied and they never will be. It takes a very special type of person to work under those circumstances.

I am extremely fortunate to have had a close association with the NHS for many years. I have met and worked with NHS managers from all sorts of backgrounds and of the highest calibre. We are very lucky to have them. They are honest, hard-working and committed. We should be very proud that the NHS is safe with them.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): As a good House of Commons man I am always sad to hear a mere knockabout politics speech such as that made by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) after hearing a thoughtful opening speech. Although our views differ across the Chamber, there was at least a genuine debate until the hon. Lady spoke. I am afraid that she does herself no good by bandying about figures, most of which I can refute, especially those concerning Germany and France. She mentioned one of the finest constituencies in the country—mine.

The House will know that I am not unacquainted with health matters. I am not unfamiliar with serving in what used to be called the district health authority. The hon. Lady made comparisons with my area, but we are fighting vigorously to prevent the closure of another 100-bed hospital. A 94-bed hospital has already been closed and two others have been reduced to one third of their original capacity. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State knows that I approve of the policy affecting the mentally ill and Shenley, but I urge the hon. Lady to do as much homework for her speeches as the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) did for his.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Instead of making the comments that she did about the Health Service, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) should have attacked the Government for making cuts in the service. Will my hon. Friend expand on some of the figures that she gave? She mentioned the cost of surgical operations and procedures here as compared with those in the United States. However, she did not say that in the United States the cost is borne entirely by the patients, whereas it is not in Britain. The difference becomes enormous. It is not just two or three times more expensive, but sometimes a choice between going bankrupt and not having the operation.

Mr. Pavitt: My hon. and qualified Friend makes an important point, and I wish that I had time to deal with it. The hon. Lady gave the figures for renal dialysis, renal transplant and heart bypass operations. Every year, I am privileged to be invited to lecture to medical faculties in universities in the United States, for which my fares are paid and I receive a fee. My hon. Friend is right. In America, some patients cannot obtain necessary operations because they have been priced out of the market. That is another problem that we must watch. I know that the Under-Secretary of State will be worried about the growth of litigation in the United States, where before one signs a form for an operation one must ensure that the doctor has enough money to pay for insurance cover in case he receives a bill for $500,000 after a failed operation. As usual, I am digressing from the main theme of the debate. I apologise for that, but it was an interesting point.

I criticise the entire Griffiths report. The hon. Member for Oxford, East and the Secretary of State recognised in words—the hon. Member for Oxford, East recognised it in more than words—that management in the National Health Service is a different ball game. But although the Secretary of State recognised that in his words, he has not recognised it in his implementation of policy. For those of us who read the Griffiths report line by line, there is no doubt that he was talking about a separate, individual, management skill — an expertise in commodities, equipment and units of production.

My hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) said that Health Service provision is about caring people who are in service, and about caring for patients. Any experience in that area is much superior to book learning, certificates or Institute of Management expertise. That is at the heart of the campaign being conducted by the Royal College of Nursing in protest against the downgrading and demotion of their traditional experience. They have had 100 years of practical experience since Florence Nightingale, although not personally, created St. Thomas's hospital. The disastrous consequences to nurses and patients of the Griffiths report lie more in the Government's interpretation and implementation than in anything it contains. The report did not recommend the wholesale restructuring of the NHS at local level, or the downgrading of nurses' professional responsibility, yet that is what is happening.

What is especially sad to those of us who have a strong affection for our Health Service is that nursing morale is at is lowest ebb for 40 years. That is because each reorganisation knocks to pieces all security for senior nurses. The House saw the disaster of 1974, the brainchild of the present Secretary of State for Education and Science. There was turmoil when senior nurses had to re-apply and find new positions in the new structure. That took place as from 1 April 1974. It was so appalling that when the Conservative Government returned to office in 1979 they had to do something about it, so the then Secretary of State for Social Services, the right hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin), had a mark 2 reorganisation. He had to clear up the mess that had been made. However, once again the jobs of senior nurses were put in jeopardy. We eliminated the area health authorities and created 191 district authorities. Many nurses in senior grades spent two years not knowing whether they had a job, and having to reapply for jobs. Again, that affeced the morale in our nursing service.

I claim that the Griffiths report is the No. 3 massive reorganisation. It is not just about management. It is reorganising the National Health Service for the third time. In the past year I have had discussions with colleagues in health authorities and, of course, with nurses, and I find that nurses with 20 or more years' experience — qualified state registered nurses, such as the daughter of my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central and my daughter, who trained at Guy's at the same time—do not know whether, after 20 years' service, their job is still the same with the same responsibilities, or whether it has any future at all.

Therefore, I claim that the Government have implemented Griffiths in the most ham-fisted way. I also claim that the Tory Government are a suitable case for treatment for their own congenital disease, which causes each Minister for Health to reorganise as a substitute for dealing with the real problems of health provision. I repeat the cry of anguish by Petronius Arbiter 2,000 years ago:

"We trained hard, but it seemed that every time we were beginning to form into teams we would be reorganised.

I was to learn later in life that we tend to meet any new situation by reorganising; and a wonderful method it can be for creating the illusion of progress while producing confusion, inefficiency and demoralisation."

I am afraid that those words of 2,000 years ago are true today when we look at the Griffiths report.

One of the immediate consequences is that the input into policy of skilled trained nursing has been dismantled. Organisation of the new structures is geared more to the administrative convenience of the administrators than towards patient care, despite the Secretary of State's protest this morning. Nurses have been demoted. They have positions of secondary responsibility in their own area. Now they will be mere advisers.

I quote from the Secretary of State's letter to the Royal College of Nursing:

"In practice so far as nursing is concerned we would expect authorities that will need a nuring adviser at a senior management level whose main responsibility is the provision and quality of nursing advice to the authority. The officer may of course carry out other duties in support of the general manager."

That is patronising in the extreme; soft soap that seeks to ease the tragic consequences for our Health Service. What an upheaval.

Nursing is now in the middle of an earthquake. In another place, on Tuesday 4 March, Baroness Trumpington, the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, said that the number of nursing units in the NHS in England is expected to decrease from 850 to 600. That is a 25 per cent. decrease, to happen in months. How does the Secretary of State think that the nursing service can withstand such shocks with equanimity? The Royal College of Nursing is seeking to advise us on those matters. I wrote to the Minister, arising from his letter to me, on 14 February and I am still awaiting a reply.

The Minister will deny that this is a major reorganisation of the Health Service. I claim that it is. Because of the importance of the hospital service, we sometimes forget that the Cinderellas of primary care—the district nurses, health visitors and school nurses—are also being profoundly affected by the way in which this report is being implemented. Shirley Goodwin, who is one of the experts, in my opinion, on the issue of domiciliary nursing care, says:

"There are a number of negative effects upon the service when community units disappear. One major cause for concern is that if the nursing management structure is split among several units, the level at which community nursing services are led by a manager with the necessary community qualifications and expertise is forced down. In some areas, the most senior managers within a unit will be graded as Senior Nurses and will report to a general manager, not a Director of Nursing Services.

It is not difficult to appreciate that busy immediate managers (the nursing officers or Senior Nurses) will have neither the time, the expertise nor the perspective to provide professional leadership".

That is an important point, because within the team work which takes place in the NHS, nurses have provided professional leadership over the decades. Shirley Goodwin goes on:

"Without a Director of Nursing Services, these tasks will either remain undone or will be undertaken by a unit (or lower tier of) general manager who knows nothing of nursing generally, let alone of the specific services provided by district nurses, health visitors and school nurses."

I shall quote again from Shirley Goodwin because I believe that she has done so much for this subject. The House and the public are inclined to pay lip service to primary care. We concentrate, inevitably, because of the large amount of resources it takes up, on the hospital service. Shirley Goodwin says:

"It is easy to see what will happen to community nursing in an authority where, for example, it forms only one part of a unit which also contains a large hospital. The unit general manager can hardly fail to find himself responding as a priority to the more dramatic and urgent needs of a district general hospital where paediatric or intensive care beds might be threatened. We all know that running today's health service is a case of constantly robbing Peter to pay Paul. But where Peter is represented by acute services vociferously championed by shroud-waving consultants, how successful can the general manager be in keeping Paul's needs firmly to the front of his mind"?

I think that Shirley Goodwin could qualify for a debate with the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South. I would put my money, I am afraid, on Shirley Goodwin.

The post of chief nursing officer has been retained in only 11 of the 191 district health authorities. That post has no power and no participation in decision-making; it is merely advisory. Another catastrophe is the change down. That has already been mentioned by other hon. Members and I shall not go too far into it. There is a change to an adviser educator in 49 district health authorities. The Royal College of Nursing is right to fear for the future of student nurses.

In case the House thinks that I am a spokesman for the Royal College of Nursing, may I say that I am a member of the National Union of Public Employees, although I am not sponsored by that body. Where nursing is concerned, there is no difference between my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central talking for the Confederation of Health Service Employees and me talking as a member of NUPE or for the Royal College. We are talking about the basic problem faced by nurses of all kinds, whatever organisation they belong to.

A new piece of management jargon is the hybrid posts. I always think of the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) when I hear anything about hybrid posts. However, there are hybrid posts in 63 of the district health authorities. If anybody cared to look at nursing structures, I think that they would realise that the hybrid post must be one of the most confusing things which have ever been permitted to exist.

If Ministers had any real understanding of the NHS or a genuine involvement in its basic principles or the caring philosophy, the harsher effects of the two previous Tory reorganisations could have been avoided. Instead, in implementing Griffiths, they have magnified the effects. Ministers come to the Dispatch Box ad nauseam with platitudes giving the impression that nurses are in favour of the Griffiths recommendations in general and oppose only small details.

As I said in my letter to the Minister, we must admit that the Royal College of Nursing is not a Government basher. It is not concerned with its own status and with the number of posts. It is concerned with morale throughout the nursing services, which have been eroded.

If the Under-Secretary of State had any sense of the mounting grievance among nurses, his first action on Monday morning would be to get down to a round-table discussion with the organisation of nurses concerned and ascertain whether, even at this late stage, something could be done. The Griffiths report has been implemented, causing much anguish to individual employees. The harsh effects have been magnified. Because of the way in which the Government have acted, they should return to the drawing board.

I join the congratulations extended to the hon. Member for Oxford, East. He made a gentle, thoughtful speech. He was loyal to his party but his speech contained enough good points to lead the Under-Secretary of State to think again.

Last night, when I was crossing swords, as usual, with the Under-Secretary of State, I told him that I would send him copies of all my correspondence. I knew that, although the big guns fire first, all the pieces had to be picked up by junior Ministers. I was not disappointed today. I realised, after the hon. Member for Oxford, East explained how he chose this subject, why on a Friday, for the first time in centuries, we saw the Secretary of State in his place. I did not expect him to last long and so the Under-Secretary of State takes his place. In these as in other matters I shall keep the hon. Gentleman fully informed. I know that he, in turn, will twist the arm of the Minister for Health to obtain answers to letters sent more than a month ago. I have not yet received replies to my letters.

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East). I always enjoy participating in debates when the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) speaks. I regret that I do not share a platform with him in the United States and share his fee. I hope that I share with the hon. Gentleman and all hon. Members who speak in this debate the knowledge that we are talking not only about management structure and incentives but about how we can maximise the provision of health care to those in need. That is what the whole exercise should be about. I agree that it is a mistake to rule out the element of consensus from management. It is important in the Health Service to have a strong element of consensus management among those involved in the provision of services.

For line management to be effective in any business, it requires management tools to do the job properly. The first and most important of those tools is the availability of data and information to enable management in the Health Service to effect an efficient service. I am concerned that, in trying to use resources to their maximum effect, we have not travelled anywhere near far enough down the road towards accurate clinical budgeting, all the way through from unit budgeting to budgeting for consultants. We must consider this important point in the development of an effective NHS management service.

[Mr. Colin Moynihan]

The new structure requires that managers recognise that professionals find it difficult to be managed. Not only in the House but in the NHS, sensitive handling by new managers in post is needed to persuade professionals to be accountable to new structures.

I shall concentrate on financial provisions. If one wants to achieve a change in the provision of out-of-hospital based services of community care, it is very difficult to ask management to implement that in a long-term policy on a year-by-year financial basis with year-by-year financial accounting. We must be very careful, therefore, about the issue of the rates and the speed of change that we expect from year-by-year financial accounting against what are careful and long-term projections of, for example, community health care provision.

As I mentioned, I want to concentrate on the most essential tool for any management system which is to be effective. That is the financial plan and how performance can be assessed against reasonable targets. The problem is that the financial criteria used by regions for the distribution of resources to those who manage the districts are often not the right and best form of distribution of resources. I particularly consider London's case in that context.

The most important issue faced by NHS bosses should be the financial system under which the managers work. Allocation of sub-regional RAWP has a detrimental affect on unit management performance at present. I have nothing against a national RAWP concept and the way that that works, although my minor reservations on that are for another place and another time. I would like to concentrate on my major reservation about sub-regional RAWP as it affects management.

Mr. Corbyn: Would the hon. Gentleman not accept, if he is dissatisfied with sub-regional RAWP, which I am, particularly in the way that it affects London, that that is of itself an inevitable consequence of the national RAWP formula, which sucks money away from urban centres such as London into the more rural sectors? While I share his criticisms of sub-regional RAWP, the hon. Gentleman will have to oppose RAWP as a whole in order to protect services in the inner urban areas.

Mr. Moynihan: I accept that there are problems and I have reservations about the national RAWP formula. My major concern about the management effects of sub-regional RAWP is that there are far greater cross-boundary flows between districts than there are between regions. I want to concentrate on that point, as my argument today will centre on the fact that major cross-boundary flows make it difficult—however efficient the management of a hospital such as St. Thomas's might be — to implement an effective policy for that hospital without running foul of financial targets. I hope that the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) will allow me to concentrate on that aspect.

Mrs. Currie: Does my hon. Friend recognise that the changes brought about by RAWP are helping inner London health authorities? My constituents in Derby no longer have to travel down to London for health care treatment because they can now get that in the midlands through the allocation of resources at home.

Mr. Moynihan: I only wish that in practice that was borne out by the numbers of people still coming into London. There is, however, still massive demand from outside London to come to London teaching hospitals. One of the major problems—rightly so—is the clinical freedom allowed to doctors to refer patients to consultants. Doctors who have a close affiliation with or training background in a London teaching hospital still refer large numbers of people to London to be treated. Financially, that acts against people living in those districts.

On the performance indicators given by the DHSS, virtually all the London teaching hospitals perform very well. Yet it is still a fact that they are massively over target. The traditional argument is that the net flow by specialty is done on national average costing by specialties. That has always been thought to be the problem, as it was regarded as insufficient. For example, in St. Thomas's hospital that is not so. There is renal medicine and surgery in that hospital which is a high cost specialty and also a regional specialty. The regional health authority makes a general allowance at full cost reimbursement for what the hospital considers to be the cost.

That is not the answer. Management is still faced with being told by the region that it is grossly over target, with the implied criticisms of inefficiency and extravagance. That is simply not borne out by national criteria. The real reason why it is so difficult to manage is that the regions say to a district, "We shall fund you for your population and give you a net credit or debit according to your inflows or outflows. We see that you have a large inflow component and a large outflow component, but our target can leave you only with a small residual component for the residents inside your district". That is fine nationally, where the cross-flow is small, but not locally where it is great. In effect, the region is saying that it is in the interests of management to treat as few patients as possible from inside its district, and, at full national costing, to treat as many people as possible from outside the district, and to have as few people as possible being treated outside the district. That is the way to reduce the cost of medical provision to those living within the district. The best thing to do financially to improve performance against target is to increase the number of day patients and out-patients coming from within the district, and to supplement that with as many people as possible from outside the district staying overnight.

If every hospital did that, NHS funding could not work on either a regional or national level. Ironically, a hospital can perform worse against target if it treats someone from its own district, because it recoups only about 42 per cent. of the cost of treating somebody from outside the district. Therefore, there is a positive incentive to draw people in for treatment from outside the district. Even if a hospital is brilliantly efficient, and treats many more people from inside the district, it can perform worse against target. I am extremely concerned that urgent attention is given by the regions under the present structure to ensure that that problem is tackled.

Other factors need to be considered by regional health authorities in allocating their district resource. The first point deals with hospitalisation rates, rather than the pure population point. It is well known that only those on the tip of the clinical iceberg are treated, and that there is a great deal of sub-mode sickness in the community. Roemer's law, developed in America, recognises the fact that if one builds a hospital, it will be filled. Hospitalisation rates vary enormously. In Boston, for example, there is twice the provision of hospital facilities that there is in New Haven. Although there are huge inequalities in provision, nobody is up in arms. Even in Chichester, taking into account age, sex and standard mortality rates, there is half the demand for hospitalisation that there is in Wandsworth. The provision of a large number of hospitals in a district of London leads people to want to use them, so the demand for the services in inner London is greater.

Given that background, it is no good a region saying, "We shall take a national average of population and as there is over-demand for hospital resources in your district, you must do something about it". RAWP fights to correct Roemer's law, but I hope that we shall move away from the population-based RAWP formula within a region to recognise some of the criteria that I have mentioned, including hospitalisation rates.

There is a historical quirk involved in the present important problems of St. Thomas's and the West Lambeth health authority. St. Thomas's lies at the tip of a triangular district. St. George's hospital is much more convenient than St. Thomas's for many of the local people. Seventy per cent. of the cases come from outside the district, and that means that two thirds of the local population choose to go elsewhere for treatment. It is difficult for management to intervene when management has no control, rightly so, over the doctor's decision as to where he is going to refer his patient for consultant and hospital provision.

Against the background of RAWP and the targets, it is difficult for some people to avoid the conclusion that it is not the efficiency of St. Thomas's hospital which is in question but the nature of the financial provision under the existing system. It gives the hospital the appearance of being inefficient. It gives the management the appearance of being profligate by virtue of being well above target.

I hope these points have been taken into account during the review of RAWP. The critical issue of the particular districts where there is a large proportion of inflow and outflow patient care can be considered in the light of the points I have made.

In conclusion, I wish to reflect on the substantive issues which have been raised today. The implementation of the Griffiths report is an important first step in improving management. I strongly welcome it. I also believe that the quality of management from outside and inside the Health Service is very high. We should not under-estimate the quality of the management that has come through from inside the Health Service. The next step for improved management is the need for better clinical and unit budgeting down to the individual consultant level. This would provide an important benefit to the quality of management and the quality of health care provision. I firmly believe this can be achieved only by an overhaul of the criteria used by the regional health authorities in allocating limited resources to their districts. That will enable us to have the good management we need for the most important service we provide the community—the National Health Service.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I welcome this debate on the structure of management in the National Health Service because I think that it is a subject that is not discussed sufficiently. I believe that the effect of the Griffiths proposals is not fully understood by many people outside the NHS.

I was studying the NHS annual report for 1985 earlier in the debate, and I noticed that in the introduction to the section on management it says:

"The NHS needs an effective system of general management to ensure the best possible service for patients and value for taxpayers' money."

The report goes on to say how last year's report discussed the recommendations of the Griffiths inquiry, and states that many general managers have been appointed. That is perfectly true. Where I part company from the Griffiths proposals for the reorganisation of the Health Service is over the effect of the reorganisation on the Health Service. I object to it because it undermines the principle of a publicly accountable, democratically run Health Service.

I do not pretend that the pre-Griffiths system of management was especially accountable or a democratic form of management. It had many faults and inadequacies, but the way to treat those inadequacies and faults is not to bring in experts from every other industry and ask them to treat the Health Service as one would treat a supermarket chain, a biscuit manufacturer or a motor manufacturer. One must look at the effectiveness of the Health Service in relation to the health of the people whom it is supposed to serve.

I strongly object to some of the management measurement techniques that are used in the Health Service. Instead of examining the overall health of a particular community or district, there seems to be an obsession with the throughput of patients in a National Health Service hospital. The Minister is fond of claiming that more patients are being treated than ever before within the National Health Service. That may be true, but what those figures do not show is the number of those patients who are readmissions to hospital because they were released too soon and had to be readmitted for treatment. That is portrayed as an improvement in health care, when in fact it is a deterioration and something that causes great suffering to many people.

Dr. Marek: Would my hon. Friend care to comment on the point that we should measure, not the number of people who have been ill and who have been cured of their illness, but the number of people who would have been ill if it had not been for the NHS, and therefore did not have to go to hospital in the first place?

Mr. Corbyn: My hon. Friend is correct. We must look at the overall health of the nation, and that is not the priority of the Griffiths proposals or of the system of general management. The Griffiths report is obsessed with the management of existing health units rather than with examining the health of the nation as a whole.

I remember, on a visit to Nicaragua three years ago, a rather wry comment being made by the Minister for Health there when I complimented her on the development of its new health centres and hospitals that it was trying to build. She asked what it was like in my area, and I had to tell her the tale of woe of closures and cuts in hospitals and hospital facilities in the borough of Islington over the past 15 to 20 years. She said, "But Mr. Corbyn, you must be very pleased that in Britain the National Health Service has so improved the health of the people of your country that you no longer need so many hospitals." Unfortunately, I had to tell her that they were being closed because of financial management, and not because of the health of the people in my community. That is still the case today.

On establishment in 1948, after much debate within the Labour party, the Labour movement and the group of people who sought to establish the Health Service, a decision was taken to go for a National Health Service, with essentially national control. While I admire Nye Bevan very much, I wish that in everything that he did to establish the National Health Service, and the undoubted success that it was, there had been a much more local input to the running of it, because this would have played an important part.

I say that because the present system of national structure and national funding effectively means that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, through the Cabinet, decides on the overall levels of spending on the Health Service, just as he decides on other services. That decision is communicated to the Secretary of State for Social Services. The decision goes out to the regional health authorities, and when the RAWP formula comes into operation those decisions are handed down to the district health authorities. In effect, it means that the spending patterns of each health authority throughout the country are decided at national level.

In areas of declining health expenditure, because of the way that the RAWP formula operates, the powers that health authorities have are unclear. In my own borough of Islington, for example, until recently we had a significantly declining population — that I recognise, although the corner has now been turned and the population is stable, if not increasing. Nevertheless, we have been told that for the rest of the decade we can expect cuts in real terms in health spending in the borough of Islington, to the tune of around 15 per cent. in real terms. Within that, there has been a centralisation of health facilities at the Whittington hospital, which has exacerbated the decline and closure of outside health facilities such as the Royal Northern hospital and some of the health centres.

Mr. Pavitt: Do not my hon. Friend and I have the same problem? We both have inner city areas that are vastly different from other parts of the constituency where there is a demand, where RAWP should not apply. In my area, despite urban aid, we are having to cut resources for Brent to send them to Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire.

Mr. Corbyn: That is a valid point, and it is similar to the experience of my area. I have no quarrel with the people of Hertfordshire, Bedfordshire, Essex or anywhere else. I want them to enjoy good health facilities, just as we wish to enjoy them. We resent being told that we are in competition with the people of Southend to get a decent hospital because we are in the North East Thames health authority. It is a ludicrous way to go about decision making. It creates false conflicts when in reality the conflict should be between the poorest people in the inner city areas and central Government who are denying to them money for decent health services in their communities.

If we look at the overall position in London, we notice that, because of the way in which the four Thames health regions are delineated, there is an outflow of resources from the inner London area to the so-called growth areas in the home counties. I do not want that to continue. I want there to be at least stabilisation and an end to the desperate and miserable process of cuts and closures that is the lot of the inner London health authorities.

That brings me to the point that I want to make about the role of elected members and the role of democracy within the National Health Service. The area health authorities; were set up in 1974. It was decided that there should be a mixture of appointments and automatic membership of area health authorities; some members were appointed by local authorities, while others represented trade union and professional interests.

The problem with that system was that although people were appointed to represent an interest as a whole—for four years I was the trade union appointed member of an area health authority — they had to operate within the terms of reference of the area health authority. They had to operate within an overall level of health expenditure, and they had to carry out the decisions that were handed down to them from a national level. This led to a reduction in the ability to innovate at local health authority level. It led to great difficulties when a local health authority wanted to increase the amount of money that it spent, for example, on Well Woman clinics or local health centres, or when it wanted to decentralise health services at local level. It is difficult to do that if a local health authority is told by higher management that so much money is being allocated to it to spend on a particular aspect of local health service provision.

When we look at the way in which the Griffiths proposals are being implemented, we have to ask whether it is sensible to appoint to a body which is funded with public money and which is designed to ensure the health of the nation a series of business experts in private enterprise who in many cases have no experience of running health services and who are obsessed with cash flow figures rather than with the health of the people whom they are supposed to represent.

If general managers from outside the National Health Service are appointed to fill the top jobs—people who have no record of involvement in the National Health Service — we shall find that the prospects for further privatisation of the National Health Service are enhanced, because their mentality is to privatise services, cut jobs and achieve short-term savings within the National Health Service. Technical savings within the NHS budget may be made, but in reality those savings are picked up by people losing their jobs, or by social security and unemployment pay when people lose their jobs in the National Health Service, or by badly cleaned hospitals. That is a common tale when privatisation of cleaning services has taken place.

Mr. Pavitt: The privatisation of a laundry service by means of a short-term, three-year contract may result in an immediate saving, but the National Health Service will be unable to provide that service again. In three years' time a hospital could be held up to blackmail. The National Health Service will be unable to provide the service again because the laundry facility at that hospital has disappeared. The longer-term provision is no longer available.

Mr. Corbyn: My hon. Friend has hit the nail absolutely on the head. If a hospital laundry service is deemed by some slick—suited individual from a biscuit company to be inefficient and overpriced, it is privatised. Its capital equipment is sold off or closed down. The hospital then has to depend upon a private laundry service. Even if, within a year, that private laundry service is deemed to be inefficient and expensive—as it often is—and the health authority wishes to return to the use of direct labour, it cannot get either the necessary capital allocation from the region or a national agreement to rebuild the laundry and the publicly owned infrastructure that has been so wantonly destroyed. The Griffiths proposals lead on to that position.

We must look at the membership of health authorities and the appointments system. Is it right that the health authority in an area such as mine should have someone appointed to the chair who cannot be said by any stretch of the imagination to represent the political will of the people of my borough? Our chairman does not, and there are many such cases.

Can it be right that health authorities should have entirely appointed members who, when they go against the wishes of the Secretary of State as they did in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt), are sacked for their trouble? They were dismissed from office because they refused to carry out the cuts and closures which were determined by the Secretary of State. It is for those reasons that the time has come to look at the fundamental democracy of the NHS.

That means two things. First, it means recognising the close relationship that should and must exist between the NHS and local government. Local government, particularly in social services and environmental health matters, is concerned with the health of the people of the community. The NHS is also concerned with the health of the people in its area, but increasingly the NHS is seen as the national sickness service, whereas the local authority is trying to do the curative part through community care, social services back up, and so on. I wonder whether it is time to look at a much closer relationship between social service departments and the NHS. Increasingly, there is an overlap.

If community care policies mean anything, they mean a much closer relationship between the social service departments and the National Health Service. I remember vividly the discussions that took place between health authorities and local government. Some discussions are fruitful and productive, but often they are not. Often it is a matter of finding out who is prepared to foot the bill for what and trying to get rid of that, chiefly because they have clearly constrained budgets. The time has come to look at that.

The time has also come to consider the relationship of appointed and elected members of the health authority. If members are appointed or elected to an authority, but are controlled within the terms of reference of that authority by national decision making, that obviously undermines the effectiveness of any kind of local democracy and accountability for what is going on in the Health Service.

I want to see our Health Service expand and become more responsive to the health care needs of the people. I want to see the end of the concept of a national sickness service, and a move to the concept of a National Health Service. That will not be achieved by appointing general managers from outside the Health Service to run the service. It is not achieved by the sort of centralised dictation that is going on at present. Let us see the maintenance of national minimum standards, and with that the ability of local authorities to develop their services much more widely into preventive medicine, Well Woman clinics and health education—all those areas which are so important but which are not being achieved at present.

It is not on to have two principles in operation within the Health Service—on the one hand the principle that we have health care irrespective of the ability to pay and irrespective of the needs of the people who are seeking health care, and on the other the concept of making money out of people's ill health or through private medicine in Britain. I want to see a National Health Service that is truly that.

That brings me to the obvious question of how all that will be paid for if there is an open-ended ticket. The issue must be faced of the amount of money that is being spent on the NHS. Moreover, we must face the issue of the amount of money lost through ill health and people in hospital queues and on waiting lists; and the inefficiency of having an unhealthy population when we could have a much more healthy one.

Britain spends less on the NHS than any other equivalent western European country, despite the most dramatic propaganda campaign by the Government. People outside realise perfectly well that in real terms Health Service spending is going down. They see hospitals being closed, increasing queues for operations and the creation of images. We talk about creative accountancy, but this is creative publicity in the NHS.

Far from being safe in the hands of the Government, the National Health Service is in grave danger in their hands. The NHS is faced with cuts, closures, the centralisation of power and the gross exploitation of the lowest paid health workers. Perhaps the Minister will now answer a question which he was unable to answer in the Adjournment debate on this subject. When agreement is reached on pay for nurses, ancillary staff or Whitley professional technical "B" grades, will the Government underwrite and honour the agreement and not pass it back to local health authorities so that any pay increases have to be paid for by cuts in services, as now happens?

1.5 pm

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): This has been an interesting debate. All hon. Members have tried to be reasonable, with only occasional outbreaks of slapstick politics and selective statistics. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) for raising this topic and for making a speech which caused every one of us to think carefully.

I even thank the Secretary of State for most of his speech, although not all of it, as he again trotted out the 24 per cent. figure as the increase in NHS spending in real terms since 1979. As I have said before, that does not represent the real situation. The Secretary of State takes a good starting year for his calculation, and then fails to take account of demographic changes with the increased health care needed by an older population, or the fact that the retail prices index for medicine and medical equipment rises much faster than any general household index. He also fails to mention that operations considered risky and unproven five or six years ago are now commonplace and are performed without any trouble at all. If the population increased by 1 million or 2 million, we would have to spend more on food. Similarly, as medical techniques expand, we have to spend more money to give life to people who five years ago might have died.

[Dr. John Marek]

The Secretary of State also said nothing about the evils of unemployment and the proven connection between ill health and unemployment, especially long-term unemployment. If more people suffer ill health as a result of unemployment, more money must be spent on the NHS. I do not challenge the 24 per cent. increase in itself, but it must be put into perspective as it turns out in reality to be far less than a casual glance might suggest.

The Secretary of State said that more nurses were employed, but he did not say that they worked fewer hours. Year by year, the Government indulge in that kind of selectivity to try to pretend to the public that more money is being spent, more people are being employed and everything in the garden must therefore be lovely. That is not true. The real interpretation is that limits have been placed on nursing manpower for the first time. Furthermore, nurses have had their working hours cut, and rightly so.

The Secretary of State read out a list of figures fairly quickly and I was unable to take a note of them all. If I have it correctly, he said that £650 million extra would be spent next year on the Health Service on the basis of inflation running at 4·8 per cent. I do not know exactly what the right hon. Gentleman's figures referred to, but if extra spending on the NHS is to be £650 million, it will not be an increase of 4·8 per cent. and it will not match the rate of inflation. As I have said, I did not hear the right hon. Gentleman accurately in that part of his speech.

The Secretary of State explained that the NHS would receive £130 million from the sale of land. I am sure that that will include the sale of nurses' homes, which is one of the factors that will have an effect on the supply of nurses in the London area. Nurses will not be able to afford to buy their own houses or flats in the London area, and it is necessary that we provide adequate housing for them. Apart from the matters to which I have referred, the first part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech showed that he was trying to address himself to the problems of implementing the Griffiths report and whether the Government have it right. The general impression of my right hon. and hon. Friends is that not everything is right.

I am glad to know that some Conservative Members have certain reservations about the implementation of the Griffiths report, but it seems that by and large they think that it is all right. Conservative Members who are present for the debate are those who care and think about the NHS. Unfortunately, many Conservative Members do not, and they are not present. None of us can be in the Chamber all the time, and that includes myself, but a member of the public who reads the Hansard report of the debate will have an impression of Conservatives that is unrepresentative of the Tory party at large and its attitude to the Griffiths report. I hope that any member of the public who reads the report will get a reasonably accurate impression of the thinking on the Opposition Benches on the report.

I wish to address myself to two main points, and I shall do so at some length. The first one is directed to nursing and the campaign that the Royal College of Nursing is pursuing that is designed to make some changes to the way in which the Griffiths report is being implemented. The college had no cause for fear when the report was written because in September 1983 Sir Roy Griffiths, the managing director of Sainsburys, in paragraph 15 stated:

> "A General Manager should be identified from within the existing team or elsewhere according to the Chairman's view of the local requirement."

The important line reads:

> "This is not intended to weaken the professional responsibilities of other Chief Officers, especially in relation to decision taking on matters within their own spheres of responsibility."

The reference to "other Chief Officers" must mean chief nursing officers.

I did not particularly like the Griffiths report when it was published. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), I do not like the idea of bringing into unit management individuals who might have been bank managers or those with some sort of business expertise who know nothing about the NHS. There is no harm in having consultants coming into the NHS, but management of it should be undertaken by those who know what the service is about.

Mr. Pavitt: Does my hon. Friend recall that when the supremo of the management of the DHSS, Mr. Victor Paige, was appointed, he was given a salary of £90,000 a year? He said that he did not know very much about the DHSS but he was a good learner. I am a good learner, too. If anyone wants to give me £90,000 a year to manage the Health Service, I should be delighted.

Dr. Marek: My hon. Friend has made my point for me. It is with sadness that I agree with him. I am sure that such a person is of no benefit to the NHS. He probably had no interest in it until £90,000 was dangled before his eyes. Unfortunately, such appointments do the NHS a disservice and represent a loss to the taxpayer.

Originally the Griffiths report was such that the nursing profession did not worry about there being any restructuring responsibility within the NHS that would leave it and its management professionals at a disadvantage. Indeed, in the Daily Telegraph of 18 November 1983 Sir Roy was quoted as saying:

> "The proposals don't threaten nurses at all. The nurses are doing a good job and the changes that are being talked about aren't designed to affect them, except beneficially."

There is the rub. Sir Roy may think that what has happened is beneficial, but every Opposition Member would disagree.

Ministers tend to focus debates on the Griffiths report on how many nurses have been appointed as general managers. But that is not necessarily an important factor. The significant point is what has happened to the nursing voice, to professional accountability and to supervision in the structures that now exist. After all, precious few nurses have been appointed to managerial positions within the NHS. Indeed, the Secretary of State gave the figures earlier.

I am grateful to the Royal College of Nursing for having provided the following information. It sampled 150 district health authorities in England. As at 10 March, 27 of them — 18 per cent. — had no chief nursing officer. That should be of great concern to every hon. Member. It means that almost one in five of those health authorities has no chief nursing officer. Thus, there is no nurse member of the management team at district level, and responsibility for giving professional advice to the health authority has been delegated to a director of nursing service from one of the units, perhaps the director of nursing education or sometimes the chairman of the Professional Advisory Committee. That means that the management of the NHS is at a serious disadvantage.

In a letter dated 16 November 1984 to the general manager of the Royal College of Nursing, Trevor Clay, the Secretary of State said:

"In practice so far as nursing is concerned we would expect that the authorities will need a nursing adviser at senior management level whose main responsibility is the provision of nursing advice to the authority."

One might have a director of nursing service, but it would be difficult for him just to concentrate on nursing within the district, because he would have other duties. There is a risk that any advice given will not put the emphasis on nursing so much as on areas of more concern to that director.

Of the 150 district health authorities studied by the RCN, it was found that 11—7 per cent.—had only an advisory chief nursing officer post. The individual had a purely advisory role and was not a member of the district management team, so there was no direct line management responsibility for nursing. Such advisory officers might have official access to the district health authority, but they are excluded from participation in day-to-day management, which would give them a real influence in decisions. In such circumstances, access to the district health authority would simply become a system of appeal against decisions that have already been made, perhaps contrary to the wishes of the nursing profession. The RCN strongly objects to that.

The RCN found that 49—33 per cent.—of the sample of district health authorities had an adviser/educator—a person responsible for nursing education, but not a chief nursing officer responsible for nursing as a whole. That causes fragmentation of the service. One of the strengths of the NHS is that it has avoided fragmentation. We used to have the matron who ran everything. More recently, chief nursing officers have been responsible for nurses, their training and education.

There were hybrid posts in other district health authorities where nurse education was relegated to an administrative function. Nurse education is slowly becoming a personnel function. Education is being fragmented down to lower units in some areas. Student nurse intakes are a significant manpower variable and there is widespread anxiety that manpower considerations will begin to take precedence over education and training. Managers from outside the service tend to regard their functions in terms of what is on the bottom line. With the best will in the world, patients tend to become statistics and staff tend to become employees with a payroll number. The training and education of nurses, for example, is not considered to produce any advantages on the bottom line, but it has to be undertaken. There is, therefore, a tendency for it to be given a lower priority. That must prove detrimental to the service.

It appears that many student nurses are experiencing difficulties. The English National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting, the statutory body for the supervision of nursing education in England, has recently had to issue a letter to district health authorities expressing concern that management arrangements mean that recognition of the school of nursing will be put in jeopardy. The Government are selling nurses' homes and not paying nurses adequately. In an earlier debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North said that nurses have not had a real terms wage increase since 1975. It therefore comes as no surprise to learn from a London newspaper recently that a leading teaching hospital is so desperate for nurses that it is offering cash prizes for recruits. Perhaps that is symptomatic of business management, but it should not have anything to do with NHS management. There must be better ways in which to organise recruitment. We know why they must go to such lengths. Hammersmith hospital in Shepherds Bush is a specialist hospital. The nurses have to train longer, and they suffer pecuniary disadvantage.

In the sample of 150 district health authorities, 63—42 per cent.—had hybrid posts. The incumbents of those posts are responsible for nursing and for other matters. Sometimes the title of the post is quality assurance manager. There is no problem if the responsibility is close to nursing, such as the supervision of the meals service in wards or the cleaning of wards. However, some of the officers who hold hybrid posts may be responsible for nursing and the ambulance service. The health authority of which the hon. Member for Oxford, East was vice-chairman has proposed such a hybrid post, with the officer being responsible for nursing and for the ambulance service. That cannot be good management. No manager can have two such disjointed functions and give of him or herself sufficiently to manage both functions well.

All district management structures must be approved by the DHSS. All the posts that I have mentioned have already been approved, despite Ministers' assurances and the contents of the Secretary of State's letter of 16 November 1984. The Griffiths report originally led nurses to believe that there would be no problems with their conditions of work and promotion prospects. However, the position is rapidly becoming different. Many managers have no nursing experience or they have other commitments, or the chief nursing officer is not sufficiently high up the line management ladder in the new Griffiths system to carry any weight or be able properly to consider any problem. The Opposition believe that such a system cannot be allowed to continue. Something must be done about it.

My second main point relates to the changes that are taking place in the number of units, largely without the public being aware of them. This is a serious matter. I thought that what are called the Cinderella services in the NHS would be properly looked after and funded because they would have independent management and an independent source of finance. In many ways, the Cinderella services are as important as the high profile acute services that are available in hospitals. Unfortunately, one of the most serious and least reported effects of the management reviews is that we have an amalgamation of units that were previously under separate management. It is common again for the elderly, the mentally handicapped and the mentally ill to come under one unit, with loss of management priority and identity. In many cases, those services are amalgamated with the community unit—although it should remain separate—which has also suffered disadvantage during succeeding years. The blame for this goes from one Government to another, right back to the inception of the NHS.

Some years ago, there was hope that all these other services and provisions would have some management priority and identity. Unfortunately, that is not so now. There has been much amalgamation. If the amalgamation goes on, especially so that those units are combined with units providing acute services in hospitals, that will be bad for the Cinderella services of the NHS. They are in no position to withstand consultants' demands, when they rightly fight for the provision of acute services in hospitals. Things go badly for the Cinderella services because they are not in the public eye. There is little public awareness of them. Unless one is a recipient of those services or takes the trouble to be aware of them, it is not easy to know that they are provided.

The public throughout the county of Clwyd have been campaigning for two body scanners for about two years, raising money here and there. I have been to innumerable functions where money has been raised for those scanners. Whether that should happen, and whether essential equipment should have to be provided by voluntary donations, is another matter which I shall not go into now. Public concentration and awareness is focused on equipment for use in the hospital and, willy-nilly, Cinderella services are left in the background.

Many of the new amalgamated units are large and often widely dispersed. Administrative and financial convenience appear to have taken priority over patient and client group orientation. Theoretically, good management would not find it difficult to give attention to the Cinderella services. However, experience in the Health Service has demonstrated that the sheer pressure from such wide, large and diverse responsibilities can overcome even the best manager. I cannot believe that the patient-client groups, such as the elderly and the mentally ill and the community service, should be lumped together with the hospitals in one unit, hospitals providing acute care and having the powerful pressure groups behind them.

Management at unit level is perhaps the most important because it is at the interface with the patients. There are proposals that some units can be managed without a director of nursing services, even at that level. I shall be extremely worried if that happens. For example, a nurse who has a problem could go and see the sister on duty, but if the sister on duty cannot resolve the problem — an emergency or something that the sister would wish to consult about — it is possible that the next line of management above the sister will be an ex-bank manager or an ex-advertising agent. Surely that cannot be good for the NHS. I hope that no district or regional health authority will allow anything like that to happen.

The new form of management means that managers down the line will become beholden to their superiors for their budgets. The problem will increase if cash sums are available for each section of the service. The cash sums will be divided up and allocated to managers below the management team. They might be reduced in years to come, certainly under this Government. "Reduced" is perhaps not the right word to use. The sums will be increased, but not sufficiently to take account of the indices that I enumerated earlier. There will be a shortage of funds. If line management is worried whether it will have sufficient funds, it will be beholden to its superiors. I cannot believe that that will be beneficial to the Health Service.

It is better to have complete freedom of discussion. People should be able to speak their minds. If there is a problem in a unit or section of a hospital or in any service, the manager should be able to say what the problem is and how urgent it is and make a bid for an alleviation of the problem. I am not convinced that the Griffiths report and that form of management will provide for that. Perhaps more importantly, I think that it will inhibit the freedom of people to speak out on professional matters, not just in terms of work and conditions, but on professional issues such as nursing or medical matters. I cannot see how one can get round managers being beholden to their superiors, unless one brings consultation, co-operation and democracy in some form—I use those words loosely—back into the National Health Service. That would mean accepting that the basis of the Griffiths report is flawed in that respect, and a different solution would have to be found.

The Griffiths report could have been implemented in consultation with the staff, it could have been implemented at a slower rate, we could have had the report a little longer and we could have been given some reasons for some of the proposals in the report. It was not well done. I hope that the Government will not disagree too strongly with that. It is still not right. I urge the Govement to take seriously the views of members of health authorities up and down the country, particularly the views of the staff within the NHS. They are largely critical of certain aspects of the Griffiths report. It can do no harm to look at that criticism to see whether there can be some meeting of minds and an acceptable compromise between the two sides. We need more democracy and more management by consultation.

The Government might disagree, but I believe that they are primarily obsessed with saving money and spending as little public money as possible in order to please the masters in the Treasury and the First Lord of the Treasury. If the Government will not work for more democracy and consultation because it means spending more money, it is a task which the next Labour Government will have to undertake. The next Labour Government will do it by consulting the Royal College of Nursing, the Health Visitors Association and the professional bodies first. After consultation, we would have to put right the mess we have got into with the Griffiths report.

1.37 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The House should be grateful to the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) for initiating this important debate. So often, debates on some of the most fundamental issues in our society attract relatively few hon. Members, but that does not detract from their value, because everything that is said is in the Official Report.

As hon. Members know, I was able to intervene briefly in the opening speech of the hon. Member for Oxford, East, but unfortunately, because of a constituency engagement to open a sheltered housing scheme—which is full of consensus and co-operation, I should add—I was unable to hear the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) or those of other hon. Gentlemen.

I hope to identify a few issues which bear strongly on the management of our Health Service, and two in particular. I begin by trying to identify those matters within the Griffiths' proposals and general philosophy which I think will carry general agreement and those where there has been, and will continue to be, strong disagreement. Unless we identify those issues, the debate will be unfruitful.

The hon. Member for Oxford, East mentioned, quite properly, the morale and importance of the managing team. He dwelt at some length—I make no complaint of this — on whether there should be a period of appointment against performance — one of the great management tools.

I do not think that we have yet made a fundamental distinction between different types of management. Sir Roy Griffiths came from a well-known chain of retail grocers, Messrs. Sainsbury. We have been adjured by the Government many times to take advice from business men —Marks and Spencer, Boots and perhaps even British Leyland have featured largely among those businesses from which we should seek advice. I suggest to Conservative Members, especially the Prime Minister, that there is a fundamental distinction in management between those providing services on a willing seller/willing buyer basis, and those providing services to the community, especially in health, housing, education and the caring professions. The simple point, which is so often overlooked, is that Messrs. Sainsbury, Boots, Marks and Spencer and even British Leyland have no obligation to provide what the customer wants. Of course, if they do not, they may go out of business. Each package displayed by Marks and Spencer is one that the company finds it convenient to provide. If a customer does not find what he wants on the shelf, he goes elsewhere.

Mr. Whitney: One goes out of business.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for agreeing with me. However, he may have forgotten that, whereas there may be 10,000 grades of product available from Messrs. Sainsbury, Boots or Marks and Spencer, every client of the Health Service is, at every point in his progress towards full health and strength, a unique case. One cannot put live human meat on the shelf, freeze it or move it in refrigerated vans, and operate à la Sainsbury. Every person requires a certain measure of treatment and human care. The condition of patients, especially acute patients, can change rapidly. I suggest to those concerned with management expertise—I issue the challenge as an amateur—that they are dealing with a totally different type of management in the NHS.

My next point follows what the hon. Member for Oxford, East said in his interesting remarks. It relates to the matter on which I challenged him on principle and to which he did not return precisely, although other hon. Members may have done so. It concerns management experience in relation to decision making. Of course, this is an exercise in stopping buck passing and in the necessity of buck taking. Someone, somewhere has to take a decision, and that person may draw on the advice of others, engender co-operation or try to decide on the basis of consensus. A decision made by Mr. Speaker is his responsibility. A decision made by a manager on the allocation of resources is his responsibility. The same is true of a ward sister deciding how to allocate resources and of a doctor making a difficult clinical decision on the allocation of his resources.

The buck stops somewhere. It may well be that the NHS needed greater emphasis to be placed on line management and on sharpening responsibility, especially in regard to the allocation and use of scarce resources. There is no question about that. That point unites us across the Floor and across parties. — [Interruption.] I welcome any intervention which shows that the Under-Secretary of State agrees with me.

As I said to the hon. Member for Oxford, East, hon. Members would not for one moment tolerate a House of Commons Commission which was not governed by Members of Parliament, former Members of Parliament or servants of this place and, therefore, servants of the public. I believe that one of the great weaknesses of British management, and the great weakness in our society, is that too many people who have the privilege and responsibility for making decisions have not had sufficient, adequate experience on the ground floor which would give them important insights into what occurs in practice.

I have bitter experience of that over 12 or 13 years in the teaching profession, and I have no doubt that nursing is much the same and may, indeed, be more fraught. As we all know, particularly in unit management, whether it be in a hospital or in a ward in a hospital, one is under pressure on numerous occasions. Unless one has experienced such pressures, how can one take decisions for others in line management?

The hon. Member for Oxford, East referred to the morale of the management team. I believe that even more important is the morale of what he might call the operatives, the rank and file, the non-commissioned people. They are the people who know.

In all the things that I have read about the Griffiths report — and I have had complaints about that report from nurses who I know personally and from people in my constituency — that distinction is not being made. In fact, I doubt whether that distinction is understood. In the reorganisation which is going on apace in the Health Service, within the management structure people are being appointed — and I trust that the Minister will put me right in his reply, although he admitted this to me in a letter — and it is possible for people without nursing qualifications or experience to be in a position of line management and taking decisions about nursing and medical matters. Medical practitioners would not tolerate that for an instant, and nor would hon. Members.

The situation is even worse. As I understand it, the implementation of the Griffiths recommendations means that people will have to apply for their own jobs. Instead of Griffiths coming along and instituting a form of management appreciation — which may be necessary, because there is no reason why traditional SRN training should include managment skills in respect of complicated scientific apparatus—and adding that to the original job, a member of staff will have to reapply for his own job. Unless somone can show management competence, for which he was not trained or recruited, and for which he presumably has only limited ability, he is liable to be dismissed.

We know that dismissals have taken place, because Baroness Cox, in a debate in another place last Tuesday, said so. I cannot quote the noble Baroness directly; I will have to paraphrase her words. She said that many senior nurses had after many years of professional service been asked to go. In fact, one senior nurse in a London health authority was actually dismissed and sent on eight months' gardening leave.

What would happen in organisations connected with the retail trade or the motor car industry if such procedures were adopted? A business may be able to sustain that using the principle pour enourager les autres. I suggest that the impact on nurses in post at present and those in training is serious, as they know that the people to whom they have been responsible, whom they may respect professionally, who have given years of devoted service and who are highly skilled, are either deciding to take early retirement —as they are—or are liable to dismissal. I put it to the Minister that when Griffths was introduced nobody thought that that was possible. Indeed, all the assurances were to the contrary. The possibility of that happening is causing well-justified concern among the whole nursing profession. I challenge the hon. Member for Oxford, East to deny that.

[Mr. Spearing]

Baroness Cox is well known for her views. She is not a lady who will criticise the powers that be immediately or readily, but I understand that she said in the debate that it would be difficult to find any nurse who believed that the Health Service was now safe in the hands of the Prime Minister or the Government. The one may be equal or less equal to the other. She is a highly respected professional noble Lady in the other place, and she has not yet been contradicted. If that degree of alarm, perhaps unjustified, has entered into the heart of one of our greatest professions, what the hell do the Government think they are doing? I apologise to the House for an unparliamentary expression. If one is in a position of uncertainty and does not know what will happen in future, while day after day one gives of oneself and then one's boss says that life is hell.

The story does not end there. Yesterday I received an answer from the Minister's twin. Nurses are being evicted from nurses homes. A circular went out to district health authorities telling them that they must be prepared to sell their medical accommodation on principle. I understand that the proposal met with a great deal of argument, and the Government changed their mind and said that it was a matter for local decision.

An answer that I received on 12 March shows that in Chester the Government are planning to reduce our 435 current units to 272 by 1 January 1988. That is a reduction of 163, or one third. The reduction is to be of the same proportion in Warrington and Liverpool. The Government plan to reduce the number of nursing accommodation units in Liverpool by 300. That is almost unbelievable, in view of what we know about that city, and in terms of what we know about the Health Service, especially as there is no guarantee that second or third-year student nurses will get accommodation.

Mr. Pavitt: May I remind my hon. Friend that the Minister for Health asked 14 regional health authorities to submit complete lists of accommodation that would be available for sale? Further, in a recent answer to a question the Minister said that he would not put the list in the Library or tell us which places he would endorse for sale until such time as the decision had been made.

Mr. Spearing: That confirms what I am saying. I hope that my hon. Friend will speak in the debate, especially about co-operation in the neighbourhood. As this is an important subject, I make no apology for continuing my speech.

The way in which the Government have approached the matter shows only too amply their complete ignorance of the psychological havoc that they are creating in our hospitals. Management is not only about people. It is about services — the "hotel" services, to which the hon. Member for Oxford, East referred—and about hardware and medical science.

Not too long ago, when I was in one of the leading teaching hospitals visiting a patient, I found out that a few days previously the staff had had to revert to using paper sheets because the supply mechanism had broken down. In three year's time no doubt the new manager will have to show what he is made of if he is to be reappointed. This is what they are reduced to. I was also told about some of the throwaway medical equipment — I think they are called flungs — which is used for giving blood transfusions. The quality of the flungs has been reduced to save money.

Faced with that situation, with, as I have said, the sword of Damocles hanging over one's head because of the likelihood of being evicted from accommodation which one thought would always be there, what will be the result? What will be the effect on those who are thinking of taking up the profession? What will people in the profession say about their prospects? The people in the higher reaches of the profession appear to be arbitrarily barred from management, yet they are the people who are most needed for the job.

The noble Baroness Cox asked the noble Baroness Trumpington a specific question in the debate in another place on 4 March. I shall paraphrase her question. She asked whether the Minister would issue a circular to the district health authorities asking them to ensure that when they make appointments to the post of manager of nursing, not only is the manager part of the team—some of them are not and I have asked a question about that—but that the district authorities will make sure that the qualifications and experience of the people appointed are within the nursing profession. Baroness Trumpington said that it was a matter for local management. In other words, the Government will not intervene.

The Minister said:

"My noble Friend Lady Cox concluded her speech with four specific questions. I have covered a number of these points, but let me now address them one by one. The question of nursing management is covered in, we expect, the structure of general management and nurse management in each unit to take account of the need for proper supervision of the work in wards and departments. This is a matter which really must be left to local decisions, taking account of the views of local professional interests."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 4 March 1986; Vol. 472, c. 161.]

I suggest to the House that it is improper to leave such a matter for local decision when the Government have already said that they will allow people without the necessary professional experience or qualifications to take these managerial roles.

When an army fights in battle, it must have confidence in the general staff. If it is aware that the general staff have never fought in the trenches, what confidence can the army place in their decision making? I thought that we had learnt that about 70 years ago. It appears that the Government have not learnt it yet.

I refer to the question of professional conduct, not only of nurses, but of medical practitioners. I raise this under the motion on the efficiency of the National Health Service. Later today the Minister will object to a Bill on this subject. The Bill relates to the inadequate powers of the General Medical Council, despite its responsibility under the Merrison report, which said:

"Parliament acts in this context for the public".

It is for Parliament to decide the nature of a contract and the way it is to be executed. The contract is between the public and the profession.

The Minister has sent me a letter in which he says that the president of the council—this is the first time that that gentleman has put an objection in writing—objects to the Bill because it maintains that the additional power that is proposed would not be helpful because it might lead to a tendency to substitute the lesser for the more serious findings of the GMC.

Mr. Whitney: This has nothing to do with the motion.

Mr. Spearing: The efficiency of our Health Service is part of the debate. I am not surprised that the Minister objects to his letter being read out.

Mr. Whitney: I am glad that the hon. Member has had a good day in his constituency. However, I draw to the attention of the House the fact that the letter refers to general practitioners, as the hon. Gentleman is aware, and this debate is on the National Health Service and the Griffiths report.

Mr. Spearing: We are certainly discussing the National Health Service. The letter concerns not just general practitioners but medical practitioners. I apologise to the House. The service that they give, and the confidence that we can give to them and to their professional body, which Parliament set up as a self-regulatory body, is part of the motion, which deals with the efficiency and competence of the NHS. We are talking about confidence. Confidence in a democratic country is the petrol of politics, and without confidence there can be no proper democracy. I see the Minister smile.

Mr. Whitney: Only at the cliché.

Mr. Spearing: I do not think that this is a cliché at all. The Bill that I wish to introduce fills a gap in the way that we can deal with these matters of professional conduct.

Mr. Deputy-Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot refer to the Bill in detail, but he can refer to it generally.

Mr. Spearing: I shall do it in a sentence. I understand what you have said, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and the Minister does as well—that is why he is not very happy at the moment. Unfortunately, the current legislation dealing with these matters, the Medical Act 1983, does not provide powers for the General Medical Council to deal with conduct that it finds unacceptable. There is no sanction, nor remedy even, of conditional registration, and my Bill would provide the council with optional powers. If the public wish to have confidence in the way that the General Medical Council goes about its business of providing services to the Health Service, it is not for the Minister to say that the Bill must be blocked.

I conclude on a happier note, but one that challenges the Government. I have been talking about confidence in the Health Service. The Prime Minister claimed that the country could have confidence in her management of the Health Service. Our debate today shows, for the reasons that I have suggested, that those who are at the sharp end in the wards, the ancillary services and the nursing profession have no confidence in the way in which Government are dealing with the Griffiths report. They believe this because those who have experience and professional knowledge of these matters are not put in the right positions and are not an adequate part of the teams that make the decisions, and will not necessarily be required by the commissioned managers under whom they seek to serve.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am grateful to have this opportunity to contribute to the important debate introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris), in whose election I was able to play a very small part some years ago. I shall not repeat the congratulations any further, nor shall I respond to my hon. Friend's point, because my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State did so, as he did to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short).

A number of important points have been made more than once, and in particular I pick up the points made by the hon. Member representing the alliance, the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft), who said that he had to leave at midday, but was hoping to return. Unlike some who returned, the hon. Member has still not been able to join us. He gave an interesting performance, typical of the contributions that we have learned to know—I nearly said love—from both the Liberals and the Social Democrats. We listened carefully to the "on the one hand but then on the other" approach which is always a feature of alliance contributions. I agree with the hon. Member for Leeds, West that it is not a question of either general management or consensus. That is an artificial dichotomy. The Government are not saying, "On the one hand," and, "On the other hand." What is at issue is not an autocratic, general management versus a happy, Soviet-type democracy. A balance has to be struck. We are striving to achieve that balance.

Having complained, as usual, about the existing system, the hon. Member for Leeds, West then referred to his own solution. If the hon. Gentleman is, as I understand him to be, the Liberal party spokesman on health matters, this has been a very important morning. Far from the National Health Service being safe in the hands of the Liberal party, it transpires that the Liberal party intends to break up the National Health Service.

The hon. Gentleman said that the power to tax should not be separated from the power to spend, because that always creates problems. The hon. Gentleman's solution, therefore, is to create regional taxation and regional expenditure. The National Health Service disappears and regional health services appear. I do not know what that would mean for the national facilities that are provided in London. There is also the rate equalisation problem to be grappled with. We know all too painfully about that in terms of rate support grant. The London region would be able to fund its activities by means of taxes on its vast riches, but that would result in the deprived regions being provided with grossly inferior health services. That is an interesting concept. I shall follow its development by the Liberal party with great interest.

I agree with what my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) said about the nurses. He said that, although he has asked nurses to explain the problems and difficulties that have been referred to in the Royal College of Nursing campaign, he is still waiting for their replies. That is my experience, too, despite having prodded them again and again. On Monday morning I had the privilege of appearing on a television programme with Mr. Trevor Clay, general secretary to the Royal College of Nursing. I asked him to tell me about the problems, because we are anxious to resolve them. I was told that the Royal College of Nursing is still working on it and that it hopes to find a few examples one of these days. That is not only my experience; it is the experience of most of my hon. Friends. I agree with my hon. Friend's injunction that the Government ought not to interfere unless it is necessary. The devolution of as much responsibility as possible is a fundamental part of the Government's approach.

The contribution of the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) was not surprising. His interest in the Confederation of Health Service Employees is well known. We were told about hospitals that are crumbling, about hospitals that have been closed and about the rest of the panoply of woe that is a feature of the Pavlovian reaction of all Opposition Members. However, that has to be reconciled with the increase in capital spending while this Government have been in office, from £365 million a year to £900 million next year.

We were also told that the Government are being very hard about pay. We have a proud record on nurses' pay. Mr. Trevor Clay was good enough to admit on Monday morning during that television programme that last year's pay settlement was "a reasonable settlement." Basic pay rates for nurses have increased by 30 per cent. more than the rate of inflation since this Government took office. The number of nurses has increased by 11·9 per cent. and the working week of nurses has been reduced from 40 to 37·5 hours.

Mr. Pavitt rose——

Mr. Whitney: I apologise to the hon. Member for not giving way.

The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) believes that the reduction in the working week for nurses is to be deplored. However, I do not think that many nurses would agree with him.

We have instituted the pay review body. We would love to do much more but, given the limitations of national finances, it is not possible to write blank cheques. We all know from the experience of the previous Labour Government where the writing of blank cheques brings the national finances. We can take considerable satisfaction from our record on pay, while recognising that we would continue to wish to do more within the limits of good sense and good housekeeping.

The hon. Member for Fife, Central talked about the tax burden. Let him consider what the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) said in the Adjournment debate at 8 am. After nine hours sitting here my memory is not what it was, but if I remember correctly the hon. Gentleman gave the example of a hospital worker with a gross pay of £130 and a take-home pay of about £80, with £43 in deductions. The damage to that is caused by the tax. If we fell into the trap, into which Labour Members would like to lead us, of continually increasing Government spending, not only on the NHS but on all sectors—the £24 billion spending spree that Labour Members are promising the country—what would that do to the taxes of the nurses and ancillary workers? That point was well made by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie).

The hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) talked about the problems of the hybrid post. We recognise the point that he was making but we also understand and accept that there are now new and different posts, not nursing posts. They widen the scope and area of responsibility. If a nurse were appointed to such a post, we would expect her to be adequately supported and the nursing role to take precedence over any competing priorities. But instead of looking on the bright side, some of the Opposition look on the gloomy side. The Griffiths proposals imply and represent not a contraction of nursing opportunities but an expansion. We now have 55 nurses who have moved by their own choice into general management. My right hon. Friend has said more than once, and it is our firm policy, that the more nurses who wish to take up management posts the better. But, as my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South said, many of them are happy to stick to their particular job.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) voiced his concern about RAWP. I draw his attention to the answer of my right hon. Friend on 17 December 1985 in column 156 of the Official Report. That implies a review of that important point and I hope that that will allay some of my hon. Friend's concern.

The hon. Member for Islington, North, in his second appearance of the day, seemed to want to tear up RAWP altogether. I hope that he will be able to persuade those of his hon. Friends who represent areas where the funding for the Health Service is a fraction of the funding in Islington, North that they will be happy when abandoning the RAWP policy which has been a feature of Governments of both complexions.

The second proposition that the hon. Gentleman seemed to offer the House was to go one better, in a Dutch auction in reverse that we had from the hon. Member for Leeds, West. He was after the regional break-up of the health authority to which I have referred. But it appears that the hon. Member for Islington, North wants a local health service. He wants it to be the equivalent of the social services departments. My hon. Friends will readily appreciate the kind of funding row that that would create.

In our earlier exchanges, the hon. Member for Wrexham was disposed to refer more than once to my explanation of the increases in real resources for the Health Service as "claptrap". On this occasion, however, I congratulate the hon. Gentleman and welcome him to the fold as he now accepts the figure given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State of 24 per cent., including next year's increase. Clearly I had under-estimated the increase. I agree with the hon. Member for Wrexham that we would like even more. I agree that there are technical advances and clinical adventures as well as greater demands from the elderly, but where is the limit? We have increased the funding by 24 per cent.

Where would the Opposition draw the line? According to Aneurin Bevan, the language of Socialism is the language of priorities. The Government speak that language and we reckon that the funds that we have given are what the country can afford. If the Opposition think that they can afford more, they must consider the pressure of taxation, especially on the low paid.

The hon. Member for Wrexham referred to the sale of nurses' homes. This is part of the drive to ensure that resources in the NHS are well used for the benefit of patients. It is a question of patients first, not management for its own sake. The patients are the first and absolute priority. As part of that approach, we must consider the real estate held by the NHS. The Health Service is one of the biggest landlords in the country and there may be no good reason for that to be so. It has been estimated that the estate includes about 100,000 flats, bedsitters and houses, 20 per cent. of which were unoccupied at the time of the study. Less than 50 per cent. of trainee nurses and less than 10 per cent. of graduate nurses were in that accommodation. The policy decision was therefore taken that much of that property should be disposed of and health authorities are being asked to proceed with that. In the future, we shall not expect health authorities to provide accommodation for staff other than for professional training or in particular local circumstances.

Dr. Marek rose——

Mr. Whitney: I will not give way, as the hon. Gentleman spoke for a long time.

There are two benefits from that policy. First, it will produce great resources—we do not yet know how great —for the NHS. Secondly, it will provide resources to refurbish and improve the standard of the remaining accommodation for the benefit of nurses and others in the Health Service. Nurses and others living in those properties, many of which are off site, will be given the opportunity to buy them at discounts as favourable as those for local authority properties. Moreover, no one will be required to move elsewhere until the end of 1987.

Mr. Pavitt: That is selling the furniture to pay the rent.

Mr. Whitney: No, it is selling property that is neither used nor needed, to put the resources back into the Health Service.

The general theme of the debate has been one of concern and I am sorry that much of what has been said by the Opposition may have exacerbated that concern. I am convinced that the concern which has been expressed is greatly exaggerated and not justified. In my travels around the country I have found a much greater understanding of what the Griffiths report is all about. There is certainly a clearer understanding than that which has been suggested during the debate.

We are not interested in management for management's sake. There must be management for the patients' sake, and it must embrace nurses and all the other professional disciplines as part of the team. As we all recognise, and as the Stanley Royd inquiry demonstrated, the previous management system was flawed, to put it mildly. We have introduced a better system, which depends on the co-operation of all who come within it. We recognise that everyone concerned has a valuable contribution to make, not least the nurses. The nurses' position is assured by all the procedures which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State set out in his contribution to the debate and I urge all nurses to understand that we are conscious of their concerns. I understand that all the chairmen and general managers of the authorities are concerned as well.

I believe that the debate will have helped to focus these worries and I am sure that the Health Service will respond. I look forward to continuing and developing fruitful co-operation within the Health Service, especially with that most important element, the nurses.

2.21 pm

Mr. Norris: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I had a good run at the start of the debate and I do not want to delay the House, as I know that it wishes to move on to other business. Through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I extend my gratitude to hon. Members on both sides of the House for a most stimulating debate on what I am glad has been seen as a most important subject.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House regards the Report of the National Health Service Management Inquiry of 6th October 1983 as an invaluable guide to the efficient management of National Health resources; welcomes the implementation of the major recommendations of the Report and in particular the appointment of general managers at regional, district and unit level within the National Health Service; recognises that there may now be the opportunity further to improve upon what has already been achieved in the light of practical experience; further recalls that the key objective of management restructuring was identified in guidance sent to health authorities in 1984 as the improvement in standards in service to patients; and resolves to continue to examine the consequences of, and to encourage further, management innovation so as to ensure that the maximum possible amount of National Health Service resources is targeted as effectively, efficiently and sympathetically as possible on the direct care of patients.

Neighbourhood Watch Schemes

2.22 pm

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): I beg to move,

That this House regards neighbourhood watch schemes as an excellent and cost-effective way for the community to help in the fight against crime; applauds the efforts of those police officers who already have helped to establish a network of such schemes; expresses gratitude to those public-spirited members of the public who are taking an active part in promoting neighbourhood watch for the benefit of their neighbours; takes note of the evidence that crime is being combated in those areas with schemes already established; and resolves to encourage those areas without schemes to establish them as quickly as possible.

This is the first time that neighbourhood watch schemes have been debated in the House, and it is unfortunate that they will be debated for only a short time. However, I shall get on as quickly as I can. It is particularly appropriate that, on the day following the publication of the annual crime figures, we should debate ways in which the public can help to combat crime. The incidence of crime, especially violent crime, has continued to rise and the public are alarmed.

The Opposition — we heard the Leader of the Opposition yesterday—demand that more money should be spent in an attempt to reduce the incidence of crime. That is fair enough, for our police must not be left short of resources. The Government have recognised that, and, since their coming to power, there has been a substantial increase in police pay and there are now 7,400 extra police officers. But, no matter how many extra policemen we have, there will never be enough to enable us to have a police officer standing on every street corner, and it will never be possible to solve all crime.

Crime prevention cannot be left to the police alone. If we are to win the battle against crime, we must all play our part. In the home, parents must be made far more aware of the influence that they have over their children. Fiddling the tax man or the DHSS is not the example to set. In the courts, magistrates and judges have a duty to show young people that crime does not pay, especially now that almost one third of serious crime is committed by those under the age of 17. I suggest to the Home Office that it is time to think about publishing the names of offenders over the age of 14 years. The publication of every offender's name over that age would lead to the derision of one's friends and neighbours and help to deter them from further crime.

For too long many members of the public have thought that the fight against crime is not for them. They have passed by on the other side of the road and failed to follow the good Samaritan's example. Good neighbourliness does have a great deal to offer. As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said yesterday, crime statistics show that neighourhood watch schemes do beat crime, especially the burglar. In London, burglaries from dwellings dropped by 11 per cent last year, and in England and Wales there was a 4 per cent. decrease. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has no doubt that neighbourhood watch schemes are making a dramatic contribution to that fall.

Stockport forms part of the Greater Manchester police authority. It is one of only three divisions out of the 14 in the Greater Manchester area that operate neighbourhood watch schemes. In 11 divisions neighourhood watch schemes are not operating. Last year, crime rose in Greater Manchester as a whole, but Stockport's crime rate fell. Chief Superintendent Tony Whittle, Stockport's divisional commander, has said that one of the greatest factors in producing that result is neighbourhood watch schemes.

Under the leadership of Inspector Peter Butters 73 schemes have been set up in a little over a year, and 1,760 families in Stockport are now safer than before. Overall, in Stockport, the number of burglaries dropped by 13 per cent. during 1985, and in those areas with established neighbourhood watch schemes the drop was far greater. It is estimated to be as high as 50 per cent.

How do we account for the success of the scheme? The answer lies in its simplicity. Anyone interested in setting up a scheme gets in touch with the local crime prevention officer who will assist the caller in arranging a meeting of interested neighbours. A police officer will attend that meeting. Indeed, there was a meeting in Stockport only last week, which more than 200 people attended in response to a call to set up a neighbourhood watch scheme.

A police officer explains how the system works. He will demonstrate how to mark property with invisible ink. That not only facilitates the recovery of stolen property, but deters criminals from taking it in the first place, as signs are displayed to show that there is a neighbourhood watch scheme in operation.

The officers also arrange visits to examine house protection. The co-ordinators of the scheme arrange for the reporting of unusual types of caller at unoccupied homes and, in particular, keeping an eye on the elderly. I am told by the Stockport police that assistance for the elderly not only helps to retain their confidence in the security of their homes, but engenders a spirit of good neighbourliness during the recent cold spell.

One thing that I was pleased to note in the speech yesterday of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary was that neighbourhood watch schemes are not confined to the leafier suburbs. Research shows that there is a greater incidence of crime in the poorer inner city areas, and that is where there is the greatest feeling of desperation. I am told by many people in one particular area of Stockport that they fear to go to work or on holiday in case their homes are burgled. That is a disgraceful situation. Neighbourhood watch schemes will help to deter such burglaries.

I have one word of warning. Once set up, it is important for the area constable to maintain contact, and, if anything unusual is reported to him, he must report back to the resident who provided the information. In Stockport, the police have arranged for newsletters to be sent to members of schemes. It is critical, when a community goes to the trouble of setting up a scheme, that its efforts are shown to be appreciated and that its interest is maintained.

There is one body of interested parties that could do much more — the insurance companies. They say that they are in favour of neighbourhood watch schemes, but they do little else. I urge them to tell anyone who is renewing his premium about the advantage of a neighbourhood watch scheme and to consider premium rebates as a matter of urgency. The insurance companies do a great job in sponsoring the arts and sport, but it is even more important that they should sponsor the fight against crime.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): I had hoped to treat the House to a long commendation of the merits of neighbourhood watch, but I fear that it will now have to be brief, though none the less heartfelt.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell) on raising this issue, on the work that has been done in Stockport and on the example that he has given of the practical benefits that neighourhood watch brings to local communities. I am happy to say that there are now 9,256 neighbourhood watch schemes in England and Wales, which represents a 300 per cent. increase over the past 12 months.

The figures that my hon. Friend quoted for the reduction in the number of domestic burglaries nationwide, and for the particularly striking reduction in those areas where neighbourhood watch schemes exist, show only too clearly the potential of neighourhood watch as a major crime prevention initiative. I am sure that my hon. Friend echoed what we all feel when he said that the whole community must get involved in crime prevention. I hope that, as the success of neighbourhood watch becomes more clearly established, even the limited number of Left-wing local authorities which seem to regard it as some sort of threat to their communities will come into line behind what has to be an initiative taken by us all, not just part of the community, if it is to be a success.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Crayford School

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maude.]

2.31 pm

Mr. David Evennett (Erith and Crayford): I am grateful for this opportunity to discuss the future of the special support unit at Crayford school.

The past year has been extremely difficult in education. All the bad news has hit the headlines and the recent teachers' dispute has caused problems for schools, parents and, most important of all, children. We must be concerned primarily with children, as education is about their future, their training for life and their ability to cope with the world of tomorrow. It is intended to help them to play their full part in society as decent citizens.

The Government have achieved much in education and are attempting much more. They have my full support. Without doubt, considerable progress has been made and I am pleased to be able to report a real success in education today—the special support unit at Crayford school. The school is in the southern part of my constituency, in the London borough of Bexley, which is the local education authority. It is a small school with about 560 pupils on its roll, all of whom are accommodated on one site. The school has had several difficulties recently, but they have been overcome by the combined efforts of the acting head, Miss Woollett, dedicated staff and a supportive parents association.

The school is an integral part of the local community and commands the wide respect of local citizens. With that local backing, the support of the governors and of the local education authority, the staff, who are extremely talented and highly motivated, have become pioneers in special education, with the establishment of a special unit. They are to be congratulated, as I am sure my hon. Friend the Minister agrees.

The Education Act 1981 paved the way for the integration, as far as is reasonable and practicable, of children with special educational needs and children without such needs. Opening the Second Reading debate on the Education Bill on 2 February 1981, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle), who was then the Secretary of State for Education and Science, said:

"We have constantly stressed that we wish to see the largest possible number of children with special needs educated in ordinary schools . . . However, our aim is not simply integration for its own sake. It is the provision of appropriate education for individuals. For many children I believe that this can and should be done in ordinary schools." — [Official Report, 2 February 1981; Vol. 998, c. 30.]

Long before the 1981 Act, Crayford school possessed a special unit for children with impaired hearing to ease their path into mainstream classes. Today, there are three special units at the school — the unit for hearing-impaired pupils, the support group and the special needs centre. The special needs centre provides an in-school service, while the other two units are boroughwide.

The unit for hearing-impaired pupils was established in 1972 as a resource for secondary age pupils from all parts of the Bexley local education authority area. The facilities cover the range of hearing impairment from moderate to profound hearing loss. Since its formation, the unit has endeavoured to achieve the maximum integration for each pupil in social and academic areas, and many pupils spend almost all their time in mainstream classes. The unit has two full-time members of staff and 13 pupils, although it can cater for a maximum of 16 pupils. Each child in the unit has an individually tuned radio hearing aid which picks up and amplifies the teacher's voice via a radio microphone which the teacher wears around his neck. During my visits to the school I have seen the equipment in use; it was interesting to note the ease with which all members of staff wear the microphones and the fact that the system operates without comment from the other children.

At Crayford school, the use of radio equipment is part of everyday life. To children with hearing loss, school and much else in the world often seems hostile. In addition, their need for some special education provision often means that the school which they attend is not in the immediate area in which they live. For those reasons, it is important that they feel comfortable at school and that they are part of the school. The attitude of the staff and pupils at Crayford school ensures that the pupils in the unit for the hearing-impaired are not set apart, but belong to the school community in the widest sense.

The other boroughwide facility at the school is the support group, which was established in September 1984 to cater for secondary school pupils who are experiencing social, emotional and behavioural problems, and who have been statemented under the Education Act 1981. That unit is staffed by two full-time teachers and can deal with up to 10 pupils. The unit aims for the maximum social and academic integration and attempts to return all pupils to mainstream classes within a year. Pupils in the unit follow the school curriculum. Rules must be obeyed and good behaviour is rewarded. Incentives are also offered to encourage pupils to want to return to mainstream classes. Here, encouragement is the key.

The third unit at Crayford school is the special needs centre, which is a school-based facility for pupils with learning difficulties. One full-time member of staff co-ordinates the work of the centre and specialist subject teachers provide individual support in mainstream lessons.

Teachers have received much bad publicity of late, a great deal of which is completely undeserved. My hon. Friend the Minister will agree that most teachers are dedicated and hard-working professionals. At Crayford school, that is the case in the special unit and in the school in general. I have received many letters from parents praising the school, and especially the staff. The results from the children speak for themselves.

The heads of the three units all have the status of heads of department. From the point of view of sensible organisation, the three units have been placed together to allow the all-important co-operation between teachers which is so evident in the school. Teachers from the special units teach some mainstream classes, and last year the interchange was widened by a rearrangement of the school timetable to allow some mainstream teachers to take groups of special needs children for some subjects, such as physical education and art.

The staff at Crayford school have been willing to be pioneers and to look to the future. Those teaching mainstream classes have been happy and willing to have other members of staff in their classes to give additional help to children from those units. Extra resources have also been available to class teachers and, in addition, the presence of a special unit teacher in the classroom has often been of benefit to the other non-unit pupils.

In any debate on education, as I am sure my hon. Friend the Minister will agree, the children are of paramount importance. We must never overlook the welfare or understate the needs of children. At Crayford school, the pupils are all-important, and in my visits to the school I have been impressed by their behaviour and attitudes. I have been particularly impressed by the attitude of the staff and other pupils towards the children in the special units and can say without fear of contradiction that the pupils in those units are full members of the school in every sense. It is essential for the success of the units that the pupils are made to feel so. They wear school uniform; they register with the rest of their form each morning; they attend morning assembly. They play a full and active part in the life of the school, and that is important to their integration or reintegration into the main stream.

Teachers, parents and pupils have all commented that the size of the school is one of the main reasons why the special units have been integrated so successfully. I am a product of a good grammar school; I was fortunate to attend Buckhurst Hill county high school for boys, which had a school roll of around 600. The head and senior staff knew all the boys by sight, and the vast majority by name. Such a size of school was friendly and manageable, and allowed the individual child to feel part of the school community. That is how I believe the children of Crayford school feel.

I regret the trend in the 1970s towards larger schools with rolls of 1,500 or more. In such institutions, despite great efforts, I am sure, by the head, staff and pupils, the community spirit is often lost. Individuals feel lost and the head and deputy heads have difficulty knowing their pupils. I do not wish to be partisan, but I feel that that is the heritage of the Social Democrat-led Labour Government of the 1970s, who allowed education to decline so much. I would welcome a trend away from larger schools towards smaller schools, especially when, as in this debate, we are talking about special needs provision.

Children with special needs already have difficulties not experienced by others, and integrating them effectively in vast and impersonal schools is not possible or practical. They tend to be isolated in special units, which is as unfair as the old separate special schools. Not only is it unfair, but it is unwise, and harmful to their educational and personal development.

The present size of Crayford school enables pupils with special needs to be effectively monitored and integrated for the majority of their time in school—in most cases, for over 70 per cent. of the school day. The provision of the support units is almost unique, as there are few similar units in the country. A recent report in The Times Educational Supplement said:

"few schools can yet have had the same experience or success at integrating children with special needs as Crayford, an 11-16 school in the outer London Borough of Bexley".

Integrating special needs pupils is not simply about putting them into an ordinary school. The National Foundation for Educational Research report, entitled "Educating Pupils with Special Needs in the Ordinary School", published in 1981, set out the criteria that it believed would ensure successful integration. They are, first, the understanding and commitment of the head teacher; secondly, the prior existence of some sort of special facility; thirdly, mainstream staff with positive attitudes and the ability to deal with special needs pupils; fourthly, close liaison with external agencies, such as social services; fifthly, suitable accommodation for full integration to foster the sense of belonging; and, sixthly, the integration of both mainstream and special unit teaching staff.

Not only are those criteria met by Crayford school; it could almost be the model upon which the criteria are based. The attitude of all at Crayford school is one of care, compassion, co-operation and integration. Such rapport has been built up over the past few years and cannot be transported elsewhere easily or built up overnight.

I have to report that the future of the special unit at Crayford school is in jeopardy. As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary is aware, Crayford school is currently under threat of closure. The proposals of the local education authority to cease to maintain Crayford school are now with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science for his consideration. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has recently met a delegation from the school in his ministerial capacity. I realise that, as he is replying today in that same capacity, he is unable to comment on the closure proposals at this stage. However, I hope that he will take my comments on board and convey them to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

I feel that I must make clear my total opposition to the closure of Crayford school. I appreciate that the school rolls are falling and that, as a consequence, education authorities must look for savings, but I believe that savings can be achieved in alternative ways which will be more satisfactory on educational grounds.

Crayford school is part of the local community. It is the only local secondary school for the children in Crayford and its closure would mean long journeys to schools outside the area for the vast majority of mainstream local children. In addition, the rolls in that area are not falling as rapidly as in other parts of the borough; indeed, a great deal of house building is taking place in the area which will ultimately place a greater demand on the local schools.

The closure of the only local secondary school would be a bitter blow to the community, not only from the practical aspects which I have mentioned, such as the travelling which would be involved for local children to get to school, but from the social aspect. Children travelling to schools away from the area in which they live tend to have two groups of friends—those at school and those near home. That fact, together with the sensible attitude of parents that children who have to travel to school outside their local area may often have to go straight home after school in winter, weakens the community spirit of the school. We heard a debate earlier this afternoon on neighbourhood watch and crime rates in this country. In any event, the closure of Crayford school would be a severe blow.

The closure has a wider impact. It affects not just local children but those in the special units. For them, the impact on the local community is not so important because many of those children have to travel, regrettable though that may be. But the effect of closure on their education is vital. The closure proposals include a statement that the unit for the hearing-impaired will transfer to Bexleyheath school. That school has a public intake of 10 forms of entry and a capacity of over 1,800 pupils. That is also where it is envisaged that a large percentage of Crayford school pupils would go. The support group would be transferred to alternative suitable provision in consultation with parents.

As I have already said, the effectiveness of the special unit at Crayford school is a result of their total integration with the rest of the school. The units are part of the school and cannot be looked at in isolation. The pupils are in the mainstream classes for the bulk of their time in school, which means that tranferring the units elsewhere, even if kept together, would not be enough. It is the positive contribution that mainstream staff make at Crayford school which makes the units so successful. I do not believe that that success will continue if the special units are moved elsewhere.

For the staff of the unit to build up the same relationship with a new group of mainstream staff would take time, during which the education of those in the units would undoubtedly suffer. The position will be even more difficult if the units are moved from a close-knit school of less than 600 pupils to a vast school of over 1,800.

For the children in the unit for the hearing-impaired and the support group, closure, and the disruption it would cause, would place their educational prospects seriously at risk. For many, yet another move of school would be necessary, and for some the third or fourth move in their secondary education. Pupils with hearing impairment would undoubtedly suffer the most.

In view of the time, I realise that I cannot say all that I would like to say about the school and the units in this short debate. I must draw my comments to a close. I hope that my hon. Friend and neighbour, the Under-Secretary, appreciates, after my few brief words, the tremendous work that has been done, and is being done, by the special units at Crayford school and their importance to the children with special educational needs. All that good work is under threat. The future of the units is bleak, because they are under sentence of death under the borough's proposals. So much good work has been done and so much has been achieved, yet the future is so uncertain.

Without doubt, the subject of this debate is a success story and all involved in this important work must be complimented. What will happen if Crayford school closes and the units are disbanded or moved elsewhere? How will the children fare in a much larger and perhaps less friendly environment? The safeguarding of the future of the special units is another reason why Crayford school should be retained.

Crayford school is an outstanding example of good practice with respect to special needs integration, with special needs pupils fully provided for while integrated as far as possible into mainstrean classes. To lose the units, which are so effective, would be educationally detrimental to many pupils. I hope that these points will be taken into consideration by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State when he looks at the proposals for Crayford school. I urge him to give full consideration to the educational arguments and hear my plea for a future for Crayford school and its special units, which are so important, effective and valuable.

The Parliamentary Under-Secratary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): I congratulate my hon. Friend and neighbour the Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) on obtaining this Adjournment debate on the future of the special support unit at Crayford school. I am glad of the opportunity to reply. My hon. Friend has clearly shown today his concern for the educational welfare of the children of his constituents, and this is by no means the first time he has made his interest in the issues known to me. The active part he played in representing his constituents' interests in the matter of Crayford school has been noteworthy, and we shall consider carefully the issues he has raised.

As my hon. Friend has observed, Bexley local education authority has proposed the closure of Crayford school and those proposals are currently before my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for his decision. Because of the quasi-judicial nature of my hon. Friend's role in such cases, I am unable to comment on the closure issue beyond saying that my right hon. Friend will take into account all relevant facts in reaching his decision, which he hopes to announce shortly. My hon. Friend will therefore understand that it would be wrong for me to go further than that today.

As my hon. Friend has pointed out, Crayford school currently has attached to it two units for pupils with special educational needs. One is for hearing-impaired children and the other is a support group for pupils with emotional and associated learning difficulties. Both units are generally acknowledged to be doing excellent work.

Under the authority's proposals, the unit for hearing-impaired children would transfer to Bexleyheath school as from September this year, along with other pupils from Crayford school. The authority proposes that the support unit at Crayford should continue to function there during the transitional period in which the buildings of Crayford school would remain in use as an annex to Bexleyheath school. This period would end in 1988, and the authority proposes at that time to transfer the pupils attached to the support unit to suitable alternative provision. These transfers would, I gather, be carried out in consultation with the parents. It is the authority's hope that the majority of these pupils will remain in the company of their peer groups throughout their school careers. I understand also that the LEA has plans to establish more support groups of this kind with a view eventually to providing four such groups spread throughout the borough.

I should have liked to raise a number of other points, but I shall undertake to write to my hon. Friend stating clearly the legal position and the rights and responsibilities that attach to such proposals with regard to his constituents.

I fully understand my hon. Friend's concern and that of his constituents for the future welfare of the children who are receiving such valuable help from the special support group. I recognise that all proposals to alter the local pattern of education provision do, regrettably, have a disruptive effect on all those concerned. I further recognise that for Crayford school this period of uncertainty and disruption has been rather a long one.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford for the trouble that he has taken to present the facts most clearly in this short debate. We undertake to give careful consideration to the points that have been made today and in the past before a decision is reached.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes to Three o'clock.

THE ARTS

Sadler's Wells Theatre

35. Mr. Chapman asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement about the future of the Sadler's Wells theatre.

Mr. Luce: The Arts Council has announced that it will increase the funding of the three main dance companies using Sadler's Wells. Sadler's Wells has raised money by its own efforts. A new sponsor has also come forward. The immediate dangers have thus been overcome. I hope that those concerned will be able to build on this foundation to secure the future of the theatre.

Museums and Galleries, Merseyside

36. Mr. Freud asked the Minister for the Arts what political affiliations he took into account when appointing the trustees of the Merseyside museums and galleries.

Mr. Luce: I have appointed the trustees of the Merseyside museums and galleries on the basis of personal suitability and experience for the task. Two of the new trustees happen currently to be Merseyside county councillors, and will relinquish that office at abolition on 1 April. They have been particularly closely involved with work on the museums and galleries.

East Midlands

37. Mr. Janner asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will take steps to assist the promotion of arts in the east midlands.

Mr. Luce: It is for the Arts Council to determine its allocation of funds between art-forms and areas; but I am happy to say that there is a strong level of support for the performing arts in the east midlands.

Metropolitan County Areas (Funding)

38. Mr. Wareing asked the Minister for the Arts when he expects arts organisations in the metropolitan counties to learn of their grant allocations from the Arts Council for the financial year beginning 1 April 1986.

40. Mr. Fisher asked the Minister for the Arts when arts organisations, presently receiving grants from metropolitan counties, will be informed of their funding allocations from public sources for the financial year 1986-87.

Mr. Luce: Arts Council clients not affected by the abolition of the metropolitan counties have been informed of their allocations for 1986-87; the Arts Council will publish the figures this week. Those affected by abolition are being given interim assurances that their Arts Council funding will be no less than in the current year. Their final figures will depend upon the outcome of negotiations with the local authorities concerned. These are in progress. There are considerable anxieties over the unwillingness of Liverpool to accept a reasonable share of the responsibility. In all other cases in metropolitan areas, negotiations are going well. I understand that announcements can be expected in most cases over the next few weeks, and that it will then be seen that most local authorities have made a major contribution.

Arts Funding (GLC Area)

39. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Minister for the Arts when he expects arts organisations in the Greater London council area will be informed of their funding allocations from public sources for the financial year 1986-87.

Mr. Luce: Arts Council clients not affected by the abolition of the Greater London council have been informed of their allocations for 1986-87; the Arts Council will publish the figures this week. Those affected by abolition are being given interim assurances that their Arts Council funding will be no less than in the current year. Their final figures will depend upon the outcome of negotiations with the local authorities concerned. These are in progress. There are considerable anxieties over the unwillingness of Islington to accept a reasonable share of the responsibility. In all other cases in London, negotiations are going well. I understand that announcements can be expected in most cases over the next few weeks, and that it will then be seen that most local authorities have made a major contribution.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Merseyside (Estates)

26. Mr. Wallace asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he last visited the Duchy of Lancaster's estates on Merseyside.

Mr. Tebbit: There are no Duchy of Lancaster estates on Merseyside.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Sunday Trading

30. Mr. Marlow asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, how many companies in which the Church Commissioners own shares control shops which are open on Sunday.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The Commissioners invest in 20 retailing companies. It is possible that some of these companies may trade on Sundays, but the Commissioners have no information on this.

"Faith in the City"

31. Mr. Chapman asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what representations the Commissioners have received following publication of the Archbishop of Canterbury's commission report, "Faith in the City."

Sir William van Straubenzee: None.

1-3 The Sanctuary, SW1

Mr. Frank Field asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, if he will detail all expenditure by the Church Commissioners on 1-3 The Sanctuary, London, SW1, over the past 20 years.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The Church Commissioners have approved expenditure totalling £163,000 on 1-3 The Sanctuary, London, SW1 over the past 20 years.

TRANSPORT

Thames Crossing, Dartford

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will publish guidelines to prospective promoters of a third crossing of the Thames at Dartford.

Mr. Ridley: I did so today. Copies of the guidelines have been placed in the Library. I am both sorry that it has taken so long to complete this work, and that I have not yet had the benefit of the Select Committee on Transport's report on tolls.

This invitation to promoters is designed to give the Government a choice of engineering solutions and methods of finance in providing enhanced capacity for the Thames crossing at Dartford. Any engineering solution meeting the Department's standards, summarised in an annex to the guidelines, will be considered.

Promoters are invited to submit proposals on any of three alternative bases: to design, construct and finance a new crossing, recovering their investment from tolls; to design and finance during the construction period a new crossing for sale to the Government at a pre-determined price; or to design and build a new crossing with the Government financing the construction as it progresses. The guidelines contemplate that a promoter who chooses to construct and operate the new crossing would also assume responsibility for the existing tunnels—and their outstanding debt—at present owned and operated jointly by Essex and Kent county council.

Any proposal by a promoter to levy tolls must include a clear statement of the initial toll, the conditions governing toll revisions and the period over which tolls are proposed to be levied.

Proposals must be submitted by 31 May. I hope to make a decision before 1 August. I shall select the proposal which offers the best value for money. The starting date for construction will depend on the passage of legislation in Parliament.

British Airways Helicopters

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Transport on what date the board of British Airways sought his consent for the disposal of British Airways Helicopters; and on what date that consent was given.

Mr. Michael Spicer: British Airways informed my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State of its intention to dispose of British Airways Helicopters Ltd. on 2 May 1985. The Secretary of State indicated that he was, in principle, content for this to happen on 10 May 1985.

Radio Officers

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on the rules on manning of radio officers on small ships applying in other European countries; if he has any plans to alter the rules as they apply to British ships; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: The requirements on radio stations and their operation on ships are specified in the Safety of Life at Sea Convention 1974 to which the United Kingdom and other European countries are signatories. Exemptions from the requirements of the convention are permitted and have to be notified to the International Maritime Organisation. From such notifications my Department is aware of exemptions issued by other European Administrations.

During the past year trials have been arranged on a number of United Kingdom ships in order to assess whether the regulations about radio officers might be relaxed, in the light of developing technology, without endangering safety at sea.

Two trials were involved. The first exempted deep-sea ships from the full requirements of the convention subject to certain conditions. The second exempted short-sea cargo ships from the requirement to carry a radiotelegraph (Morse) station and radio officer, again subject to certain conditions.

In the light of the results of those trials my Department will now be prepared to grant exemptions from the relevant regulations to cargo ships engaged in the short-sea trades and all ships in the unlimited trading area provided certain other conditions are met.

Cabotage

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will make a further statement on negotiations within the European Community to open closed cabotage trade to British vessels.

Mr. Ridley: There has been no Transport Council since my last statement on 13 January—Volume 89, column 764-65. The next Council will be on 14 March and shipping matters will be further discussed then.

Aircraft Noise

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will add Woking borough council to the list of local authorities to be consulted in connection with his aircraft noise index study.

Mr. Ridley: I have arranged for Woking borough council to be included in the formal consulation process on the aircraft noise index study.

Motor Trade (Licensing)

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to have completed his review of the question of trade licensing within the motor trade.

Mr. Michael Spicer: This review has now been completed and an announcement will be made shortly.

Commissioners of Irish Lights

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many persons are employed by the commissioners of Irish lights around the coast of (a) Northern Ireland and (b) the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Ridley: The commissioners at present employ 595 people. I understand that 29 are employed in Northern Ireland and 566 in the Republic of Ireland.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Johnson Matthey Bankers

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on possible charges arising out of the Johnson Matthey Bankers frauds investigation.

The Attorney-General: The investigation continues to be vigorously pursued by the fraud investigation group. The question of charges in relation to any particular individual cannot be decided until the appropriate stage of the investigation has been concluded.

Fraud (Prosecution)

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Attorney-General if, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen), 25 February, Official Report, column 484, there are any proposals to charge any persons in the four cases referred to which involve the misappropriation of public money; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: In each case the investigation is continuing and I understand that in one case an individual has been charged with a criminal offence. That decision and any future decisions as to charges are matters for the Director of Public Prosecutions and not Her Majesty's Government.

European Community (Budget)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Attorney-General what progress has been made in the interim application made by the United Kingdom in the European Court of Justice relating to the use by the Commission of funds supplied under the illegal budget of the European Assembly; when he expects the issue to be heard by the European Court; and if he will make a further statement.

The Attorney-General: The application for interim relief has been lodged with the European Court of Justice and is due to be heard on 10 March.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Prison Population.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the size of the present prison population in Northern Ireland divided into terrorist type offenders and other offenders categorised by age and sex in the following groups: under 18 years old, 18 to 25 years, 25 to 30 years, 30 to 40 years, 40 to 50 years, 50 to 60 years and over 60 years; and if he will give a breakdown of the length of sentence being served by each age group.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 February 1986, c. 728.]: At 9 February 1986 there was a total of 1,653 sentenced prisoners in Northern Ireland prison establishments. This figure includes inmates in the young offenders centre.

The breakdown of the population is as follows:

Age	Scheduled offences Males	Females	Total	Average sentence for determinate sentenced prisoners (years)

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Deakins asked the Paymaster General (1) if he will publish a table showing (a) the percentage unemployment rate for each month since May 1979 and (b) the rate recalculated to include the number of self-employed now to be taken into account;

(2) if the change in the basis of calculating the rate of unemployment by including the self-employed in the calculations was requested by the statisticians in his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The more widely based unemployment rate which I announced on 19 February will be published together with the rate calculated on the previous basis.

It will provide a better indicator of the proportion of the total labour force out of work. I have been assured by our statisticians that there can be no statistical objection to expanding labour market data in this way.

The more narrowly defined rate remains relevant because it allows consistency between the national rate and the rates for individual travel-to-work areas. Information on self-employment is not available at the level of travel-to-work areas.

The results of the 1985 labour force survey are expected shortly. These, together with the results of the 1984 census of employment, will enable revisions to be made of the estimates of the employed labour force. They should provide the basis for the publication of the additional unemployment rate for the first time in June, but this timetable is provisional. At that time, comparable monthly rates back at least to May 1979 will be provided. The more narrowly defined rate for each month since May 1979 is given in the table.

Sir Frederic Bennett asked the Paymaster General if he will give the latest figures for the number of men aged 60 to 64 years who are currently in work.

Mr. Lang: It is estimated from the labour force survey conducted in the spring of 1984 that there were 768,000 men aged 60 to 64 years in paid employment in Great Britain.

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Caborn asked the Paymaster General if an instruction has been issued to Health and Safety Executive inspectors preventing them, following a site visit, from writing to union representatives at the site with a copy of the advice given by the Health and Safety Executive to the site operator.

Mr. Trippier: No such instruction has been issued. There has been no change in the guidance on the provision of information by inspectors and other staff to employees or their representatives.

Mr. Caborn asked the Paymaster General how many grade 1B Health and Safety Executive inspectors he expects to leave the Health and Safety Executive in 1986 based on previous years; and how many Health and Safety Executive grade 1B inspectors are to be appointed in 1986.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Batley and Spen

Mrs. Peacock asked the Paymaster General if he will list the help being provided by his Department for (a) the young unemployed and (b) the long-term unemployed in Batley and Spen.

Mr. Lang: The numbers currently benefiting from our employment and training measures in Batley and Spen are set out below. Because of the various bases on which local statistics are collected an unknown proportion may fall outside the constituency. YTS and the young workers scheme are particularly designed for young people, and our principal measure for the long term unemployed is the community programme.

	Number
Community programme	256
Enterprise allowance scheme	1,135
Job release scheme	690
Youth training scheme	2,277
Young workers scheme	290

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Hormones

Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his policy towards the European Economic Community on the question of hormones.

Mr. Jopling: The possibility of proceedings in the European Court of Justice is under active consideration.

Co-responsibility Levy

Mr. Hicks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will reconsider his decision to deduct the co-responsibility levy on an annual basis rather than every six months as at present; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I am not aware of any proposal to change the current arrangements for monthly collection of co-responsibility levy. The Commission has, however, proposed six monthly collection of the supplementary levy, which is currently collected on an annual basis, as part of the 1986-87 price proposals. We are still considering the proposal in detail, but my initial view is that although it might cause some difficulties, it could well reduce the risk of exceeding quota in the Community as a whole.

EC (Food Prices)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his reply of 20 February, Official Report, column 332, why the price at which sugar was made available to eastern Europe from the EEC fell between 1984 and 1985 by the amount shown; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The statistics given in my right hon. Friend's reply were extracted from Eurostat sources which in turn are collated from statistics provided by member states. The average unit value quoted for sugar exported in 1984 from the European Community to eastern Europe, excluding the USSR, related to exports of about 1,000 tonnes. The possible inclusion of special sugar products in this small quantity could explain the high average unit value. The larger volume of exports in 1985—January-October—includes a substantial proportion of raw sugar and the average unit value was more in line with the average world price.

Export Rebates

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the information he presented on 20 February, Official Report, column 334, on the price at which various foodstuffs were made available to the Soviet Union included special sales agreed by the management committee of the EEC; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The information contained in my right hon. Friend's reply of 20 February was extracted from the Eurostat trade data base constructed by the Statistical Office of the European Community (SOEC) from information provided by the member states. The exports recorded represent all sales from the Community reported to SOEC as having taken place in the period shown. The figures shown for 1985 were provisional.

EC (Surplus Food)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a table showing the amounts spent by the EEC on the storage of surpluses, the provision of export rebates and for the withdrawal of perishable food-stuffs from the market, respectively, over the most recent annual period for which figures are available, expressed in pounds sterling per week of the year in question.

Mr. Gummer: The information requested is as follows:

1985 expenditure (provisional figures) converted to weekly basis

	£ million
Storage of products in public intervention	15
Export refunds	75
Withdrawals (fish, fruit and vegetables)	3

Opium Poppy

Sir Edward Gardner asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to how many acres of land in the United Kingdom during the next 12 months are to be used for the cultivation of the opium poppy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Statistics are not available but reports indicate that up to about 200 acres of poppies of the type papaver somniferum may be grown in commercial trials in the United Kingdom this year. Imported poppy seed is currently used in the confectionery industry and the seed oil has potential uses both in food, medicine and other products.

EC (Butter Exports)

Mr. Richard Shepherd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the most recent price per pound at which the EEC has agreed to sell butter to the Soviet Union; what subsidy that represents per pound of butter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The price at which butter is sold to the Soviet Union is a commercial matter to be decided by individual traders when negotiating export contracts. Such sales attract the normal third country export refund. this refund is currently equivalent to approximately 50p per pound for eighty per cent. fat butter. On 28 February the Commission proposed special arrangements for the sale of butter from intervention stores at reduced prices to certain destinations including India, pakistan and the USSR. The butter is question is at least 18 months old and the amount of the price reduction will be determined by competitive tender. Normal export refunds will also apply to sales under these arrangements.

Liquid Skimmed Milk

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much liquid skimmed milk was subsidised for use as stockfeed in 1985 to date in the United Kingdom; and what was the cost of the subsidies involved.

Mr. Gummer: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Unfit Food

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what quantities of (a) beef, (b) butter and (c) skimmed milk have been made unfit for human consumption under European Economic Community policies from 1984 to date; and, in each case, what was the ultimate use of the product.

Mr. Gummer: In 1984 3,739,000 tonnes of liquid skimmed milk and 3,198,000 tonnes of skimmed milk powder were made available for animal feed through EC schemes which provide for denaturing, although not all the milk was denatured before use. Figures are not yet available for later years. No beef or butter has been deliberately rendered unfit for human consumption.

Intervention Stocks

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will provide a list of United Kingdom and European Community agricultural produce in public intervention and assisted private storage in England and the United Kingdom, respectively, and the amount held at the latest available date.

Mr. Gummer: The quantities of agricultural produce held in intervention and assisted private storage at 31 January 1986 were:

'000 tonnes

	England	United Kingdom
Beef	*37	88
Butter	156	207
Skimmed milk powder	20	41
Feed wheat	3,800	3,891
Barley	1,465	2,065

* Excluding quantities held in assisted private storage which are not separately recorded for England.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Spain

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the latest arrangements for Spain's accession to the European Economic Community.

Mrs. Chalker: Spain and Portugal acceded to the European Community on 1 January 1986. The terms of their accession are contained in their treaty of accession, signed on 12 June 1985 and debated in this House on 4 and 10 December at columns 313-53, 859-91.

Costa Rica

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has held with Oscar Arias following the latter's election as President of Costa Rica.

Mr. Eggar: No opportunity for discussions has yet arisen. However, a message of congratulation was sent to Dr. Arias on his election and we look forward to continuing the very good relations which we enjoy with Costa Rica.

South Atlantic Islands Development Corporation Ltd.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to inform himself as to the nature and directors of the two European legal entities referred to in the reply of 27 January, Official Report, column 369.

Mr. Eggar: In response to our inquiries, the South Atlantic Islands Development Corporation Ltd. has informed us that it has no knowledge of these details.

Seismic Detection Stations

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department has had any discussions with the Government of the Soviet Union on the stationing of tamper-proof seismic detection stations inside the Soviet Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: There have been no recent discussions.

Test Ban Treaty Negotiations

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there are any reasons, other than concerns over verification, that prevent Her Majesty's Government from pursuing comprehensive test ban treaty negotiations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: In the event of a resumption of negotiations on a comprehensive test ban questions other than verification would no doubt have to be addressed, but, as the hon. Member is aware, our view remains that it would be premature to resume negotiations while outstanding verification issues remain unresolved.

El Salvador

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any discussions have been held with the Contadora group on the proposed military training in the United Kingdom of members of the El Salvador armed forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: No.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to discuss with the Government of El Salvador the arrangements for the training of members of the El Salvador armed forces in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: No. Our offer to train one or two Salvadorean officers still stands, but the arrangements have not yet been finalised.

ENERGY

National Coal Board

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of the National Coal Board; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Peter Walker: I meet the chairman of the National Coal Board frequently and discuss a wide range of subjects affecting the coal industry.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, when next he meets the chairman of the National Coal Board, he will discuss the consequences of the new accounting procedures whereby the National Coal Board attributes interest charges on capital investment and the costs of subsidence damage to individual collieries and their particular consequences for coal mines situated close to built-up areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The accounting procedures applied by the National Coal Board are matters for the board in consultation with its external auditors.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Energy what assessment he makes of the effect of the downward turn in oil prices on the National Coal Board's break-even point and on the expected demand for coal; whether he will have to seek to extend the borrowing powers legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: It is too soon to make an assessment of the impact of lower oil prices on the NCB's finances in view of the many uncertainties involved.

Oil Statistics

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy what were United Kingdom oil production and oil exports, respectively, in million barrels per day in 1985; what were total export earnings; and what was the value of oil exports as a proportion of total United Kingdom exports.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: United Kingdom oil production in 1985 was 2·65 million barrels per day, and exports of crude oil and petroleum products are provisionally estimated at 2 million barrels per day. The total value of exports in 1985 was £78,072 million: exports of oil and oil products accounted for £16,050 million, or 21 per cent. of this total.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to the total cost, including interest on capital, depreciation and all overheads, of producing each barrel of United Kingdom oil in 1985.

Mr. Buchanan-smith: The average cost before taxation of producing oil from fields in production in 1985 was £7 per barrel, equivalent to $9 per barrel at the average exchange rate for the year. This estimate includes all relevant development and overhead costs with capital costs annuitised at 10 per cent. in real terms over field life.

Details on the 1984 costs are given in chapter 6 of the Department of Energy's 1985 Brown Book.

Combined Heat and Power

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has given any guidance to the Central Electricity Generating Board or area boards on how they may participate in combined heat and power consortia; what equity percentage they may inject; and what criteria on discounted rate of return on such investment is required.

Mr. Goodlad: In July 1983 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State told the chairman of the Electricity Council to encourage electricity boards to adopt and support schemes for the combined production of heat and electricity, in accordance with the provisions of the Energy Act 1983. Boards are also expected to aim at maximising the involvement of private risk capital in areas of their operations wherever possible. CHP schemes should meet the financial criteria applied by boards in relation to their other expenditure.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

National Seed Development Organisation and Plant Breeding Institute

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received opposed to the privatisation of plant breeding work at the National Seed Development Organisation and the Plant Breeding Institute.

Mr. Walden: None. However, I understand that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has received four representations.

Educational Welfare Officers

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report the number of educational welfare officers in England in each of the last five years.

Mr. Chris Patten: This information is not collected by the Department.

Freedom of Speech

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the maintenance of freedom of speech in universities, with special reference to the views expressed to his Department by the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals.

Mr. Walden: The Government have consistently made clear their view that the protection of freedom of speech at institutions of higher education should be of primary concern to all members of such institutions. They have therefore welcomed both the publication before Christmas by the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals of its guidance to universities on freedom of speech and lawful assembly, and the assurance that nothing in that guidance should be a pretext for an institution to cancel a meeting other than in extreme circumstances.

Creches

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has on which institutions of further or higher education have established creches for their students' and employees' children.

Mr. Walden: No record of such information is held centrally.

Student Grants

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will introduce a system of student grants biased in value in favour of those subjects beneficial to manufacturing industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: The mandatory grant system does not distinguish between subjects of study, and there are no plans that it should do so. The regulations do, however, allow for students to benefit from an industrial scholarship of up to £1,600 without any reduction in basic grant; and from September 1986 new tax-free bursaries will be available in addition to maintenance grants for certain students training to teach craft, design and technology, mathematics or physics.

Secondary Education

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average length of time taken by his Department to reach a decision on proposals for secondary school reorganisation submitted by local education authorities over the last three years.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 26 February 1986, c. 581]: The average period between publication of secondary school reorganisation proposals and the final decision by the Secretary of State over the last three years was 8·8 months. This includes the two-month period during which statutory objections can be made and the further month allowed before a local education authority must submit these objections and their comments to the Secretary of State.

Overseas Students

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students from (a) overseas and (b) the United States of America are currently studying in British universities and polytechnics (i) in total and (ii) by institutions; and what were the comparable figures for 1979, expressed in figures and as a percentage of all students.

Mr. Walden: [pursuant to his reply, 26 February 1986, c. 576]: The available information is given in tables 1 and 2. The percentages shown relate to the total numbers of full-time and part-time students. Overseas students are defined as those whose permanent domicile is outside the United Kingdom. In 1984 the numbers of overseas university postgraduate students have been taken as those who paid the overseas rate of fees as the numbers with overseas domicile is not available for each individual university. The numbers of students from the USA at each individual university could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

India (Westland Helicopters)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what criteria he used in deciding whether the grant of aid to India to finance the purchase of Westland helicopters represented value for money; what steps he took to satisfy himself that those criteria had been fulfilled; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: I am satisfied that the usual procedures were followed before the decision was reached to offer grant aid to finance the purchase of Westland helicopters for India.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any arrangements have been made or discussed with Westland plc with a view to reducing the cost of the aid project for the supply of helicopters to India by any payment by or on behalf of Westland to the Exchequer, or by any other means; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: It would not be appropriate to disclose discussions relating to commercial negotiations. However, I can confirm that no such payment has been or will be made.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the aid contracts for the supply of helicopters to India are expected to be signed; who are the parties to the contract; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The contract for the supply of helicopters to India will be signed by the Indian Helicopter Corporation and Westland plc. The grant aid agreement providing finance for the purchase of the helicopters will be signed by the Governments of the United Kingdom and India. Both agreements are expected to be signed shortly.

Nicaragua

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has altered his instructions to the German executive director of the Inter-American Development Bank in view of Nicaragua's decision to permit a technical review in respect of the proposed loan for agriculture; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: This project is still under discussion between the bank's management and the Nicaraguan Government. Instructions will be sent to the executive director of the constituency containing the United Kingdom before the matter comes to the board.

WALES

Tourism

10. Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will state the level of Government support for tourism in Wales for the current year.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: For 1985-86 the Wales Tourist Board has been allocated £7·696 million. of which £2·5 million is for section 4 projects. Tourism support also comes from the Welsh Development Agency, the Development Board for Rural Wales and CADW; from expenditure on the urban programme, roads, museums and art galleries; and from certain MSC schemes.

Labour Statistics

12. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the percentage unemployment in 1979 for the Rhondda valleys; and what is the present percentage based on the 1979 criteria.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The February 1979 rate of unemployment in the Pontypridd travel-to-work area, which included the Rhondda valleys, was 8·1 per cent. A percentage for February 1986 is not available on the 1979 criteria.

15. Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people were unemployed shown in unadjusted figures in 1979 and at the latest available date in 1986 in (a) Wales and (b) Clwyd; and if he will express the increase both as totals and as percentages.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The unadjusted February 1986 unemployment figures for Wales and Clwyd are 188,405 and 25,549 respectively. Unadjusted figures for 1979 were produced on a different basis and cannot properly be compared with this year's.

European Regional Development Fund

16. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total value of grants which Wales has received from the European regional development fund in each of the past three years and in the current year to date.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Net commitments for the European Commission's financial years of 1983, 1984 and 1985 now stand at £41·7 million, £58·2 million and £56·9 million respectively. No allocations have yet been made for 1986.

17. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people are unemployed in Wales; what percentage of the population of working age they represent; and how these figures compare with the figures for corresponding months in the last six years.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The seasonally adjusted number of people unemployed in Wales on 6 February 1986 was 176,900. Estimates of the population of working age are only published annually by the Registrar General and the latest figure relates to June 1984, when the unemployed in Wales represented 9·8 per cent. of the population of working age. The equivalent percentage for the years 1979 to 1983 were 4·3 per cent., 5·2 per cent., 8·1 per cent., 8·9 per cent. and 9·6 per cent. respectively.

18. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of state for Wales what are the latest unadjusted figures for unemployment in (a) Newport, (b) Gwent and (c) Wales; what were the equivalent figures in May 1979; and what was the percentage increase in each case.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The unadjusted February 1986 figures for Newport, Gwent and Wales are 13,288, 30,602 and 188,405. Unadjusted figures for 1979 were produced on a different basis and cannot properly be compared with this year's.

20. Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many new jobs have been created since 1979 up to the latest convenient date in Wales, in the county of South Glamorgan and in the area of the Vale of Glamorgan borough council; and how many new jobs are in prospect in each case.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: As I have made clear in my answer to an earlier question from my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Mon (Mr. Best), it is impossible to say how many new jobs have been created since 1979. However, projects for which offers of regional selective assistance or, where applicable, regional development grants were accepted, or which were allocated Government-financed factories have promised to provide over 90,000 jobs in Wales, over 8,000 jobs in the county of South Glamorgan and 1,300 jobs in the area of the Vale of Glamorgan borough council. Other jobs will have been created without Government assistance, particularly in the service sector and among the self-employed.

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many grants, giving their total value, have now been received from the European regional development fund in Wales, in South Glamorgan and in the area of the Vale of Glamorgan borough council, respectively.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Since the fund's establishment, 1,050 grants to the value of £322·8 million have been committed to schemes in Wales, of which 108 grants to the value of £65·7 million in commitment have been in respect of schemes in south Glamorgan and 18, totalling £21·5 million in respect of schemes in the Vale of Glamorgan.

Welsh Water Authority

13. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales, consequent upon privatisation of the Welsh water authority, what conditions he will impose to ensure all domestic water in Wales is fit to drink.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The Welsh water authority is currently under a statutory duty, and takes all appropriate precautions, to supply wholesome water. That duty will continue, as is indicated in paragraph 66 of Cmnd. 9734 — "Privatisation of the Water Authorities in England and Wales."

Cynon Valley (Unemployment)

14. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received on the current unemployment situation in the Cynon Valley; and what action he proposes to take in consequence.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The hon. Lady knows of the representations which she herself made to me at our meeting on 10 February, and I have of course received other approaches on this question from time to time. The Government will continue to deploy the full range of available measures to create new jobs in the Cynon valley.

"Better Schools"

19. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what progress has been made towards the objectives set out in "Better Schools."

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Bill to reform the government of schools, to provide for the appraisal of teachers, and for new financial arrangements for the training of teachers, is now before Parliament. Discussions with the education partners on size of schools and targets for the removal of surplus places are under way; preparations for the introduction of the GCSE are in train; the preparation and evaluation of a national formula for records of achievement for school leavers is proceeding; and steady progress is being made towards agreement on the form and content of the curriculum.

Welsh Development Agency

21. Sir Peter Emery asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has had about the practice of the Welsh Development Agency in seeking to entice firms to move their factories from East Devon to Wales; and whether he will issue a direction to the authorities to desist from seeking to entice firms in this way.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have had no such representations. The role of the joint Welsh Development Agency/Welsh Office inward investment body, WINvest, is not to entice firms to move but to encourage companies seeking a new location to consider Wales.

South-West Wales (Cancer Treatment)

22. Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether there are any plans to extend and improve the radio therapeutic and allied cancer treatments provided for the south-west Wales area.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The Welsh medical committee has been asked to investigate and report on the adequacy of cancer services throughout Wales. Its report is expected shortly.

Agriculture

23. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the present state of the agriculture industry in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Poor weather in 1985 contributed to a decline in Welsh farming incomes in that year. However, the worst-affected sectors have benefited from recent increases in hill livestock compensatory allowances and the exceptional weather aid scheme. Support measures for the livestock sector are currently being considered in the CAP price negotiations for 1986-87. While we will seek to ensure that United Kingdom and Welsh producer interests are not discriminated against, pressure on farming incomes will continue as long as there remains the need to contain the cost of agricultural support and to reduce surpluses.

Housing Repairs

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many former council houses in (a) Cardiff North and (b) Wales come within the provisions of the Housing Defects Act in total and under each type of design.

Mr. Mark Robinson: According to Cardiff city council, the number of former council houses in Cardiff, North of the types designated under the Housing Defects Act 1984 is as follows:

	Number
Airey	8
Woolaway	72

According to local authorities in their 1986-87 HSIP submissions there were 2,079 dwellings in Wales which came within the provisions of the Housing Defects Act 1984. Reliable information on the exact numbers of the various types is not available, but the following types are known to exist in Wales: Airey; Cornish; Gregory; Hawksley Schindler; SGS; Orlit; Reema; Wates and Woolaway.

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with home owners, their representatives and agents and local councils regarding the implementation of the Housing Defects Act in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Implementation of the Housing Defects Act has been discussed several times at meetings of the Welsh Housing Consultative Committee which is chaired by a Welsh Office Minister. Last year Welsh Office officials held two seminars for local authorities to discuss the operation of the Act and there have been a number of meetings between officials and individual district councils.

On 6 February a meeting was held between officials and representatives of five PRC home owner associations and the consultant which they have engaged to discuss a number of issues of concern to the associations.

South Glamorgan County Council

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of South Glamorgan county council's likely rate increase if it acceded to his proposal, made at his meeting with representatives of Welsh county councils on 17 February, for a reduction in its planned increase in spending from 9 per cent. to 7·5 per cent.; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with South Glamorgan county council concerning its rate precept for 1986-87; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: When I met representatives of all Welsh county councils on 17 February they refused to consider making any reduction in their planned spending for 1986-87 and were on course to press ahead with unjustifiable rate increase without regard for their ratepayers. I was not prepared for the interest of ratepayers to be disregarded in this way. I have therefore decided, in their interests, to recycle £13 million of the grant that would have been unclaimed as a result of county council overspending. As a result of this decision South Glamorgan county council has reduced its proposed precept increase by 5p to 183·2p—24·3 per cent. above the precept for 1985-86. Had the county also reduced the increase in its planned expenditure by 1½ per cent., the precept could have been reduced by a further 8·3p to 174·9p. If the council had budgeted to spend in line with the 1986-87 RSG settlement, the best for Wales for many years, its precept could have been et at 156·5p—a result which would have been to the clear advantage of ratepayers. In fact, spending is set to increase by 9·4 per cent., over 1985-86 budgets or more than twice the rate of inflation. This decision will place an intolerable burden on ratepayers. I hope that, like Dyfed, South Glamorgan and other overspending councils will think again. They can and should reduce the burden they have now placed on their ratepayers.

Roads

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report a list of those roads in Wales for which his Department has responsibility.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Welsh Office has responsibility for the following trunk roads where they are within Wales.

M4, A5, A40, A44, A48, A55, A449, A458, A465, A470, A477, A479, A483, A487, A489, A494, A550, A4042, A4060, A4076, A4232, A4080.

Cervical Carcinoma

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report for each of the last five years, for Singleton hospital, Swansea, the number of patients who died while waiting to receive treatment for a cervical carcinoma.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is not available centrally.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will publish in the Official Report for each of the last five years for Singleton hospital, Swansea (a) the average waiting time in days for a patient to receive radiotherapy treatment for a cervical carcinoma and (b) the longest waiting time in days for any patient before receiving radiotherapy treatment for a cervical carcinoma;

(2) if he will publish in the Official Report for each of the last five years the longest period that a patient waited for radiotherapy treatment for a cervical carcinoma in each hospital providing that facility in Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The available information is given in the following two tables, the first of which shows, for each of the years 1980 to 1984, the total number of deaths and discharges of in-patients who received radiotherapy treatment for a cervical carcinoma at Singleton and Velindre hospitals, respectively, analysed by type of admission—immediate, waiting list, booked and other. The second table shows, for each of these years, the median waiting time and the maximum waiting time before admission to hospital for waiting list and booked cases.

Noxious Substances (Disposal)

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will make it his policy to impose on local authorities a duty to assist pharmacists with the disposal of arsenic and other noxious substances.

Mr. Mark Robinson: No. Waste disposal authorities are already able to advise waste producers, including pharmacists, on the most suitable methods of disposal.

Public Woodland

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many acres of public woodland exist in Wales; how many Forestry Commission employees there are in Wales; and what is the estimated value of public woodland in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 31 March 1985 the Forestry Commission managed 136,004 hectares of woodland in Wales. This woodland was valued at approximately £293 million.

At 31 December 1985 there were 1,000 Forestry Commission employees based in Wales.

Breast Cancer

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether it is the practice of health authorities in Wales, in cases where breast cancer has at any time been suspected, to recall that patient at regular intervals for further screening.

Mr. Mark Robinson: It is a matter for the clinical judgement of the consultant concerned with an individual case to determine what further monitoring or treatment is necessary.

Intervention Stocks

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide a list of United Kingdom and European Community agricultural produce in public intervention and assisted private storage in Wales, the amount held and the value of produce in public intervention at the last available date.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The quantities of agricultural produce held in intervention stores and assisted private storage in Wales on 31 January 1986 is as follows:

Intervention Stores	Tonnes
Beef	736
Butter	16,948
Skimmed milk powder	4,202
Feedwheat	19,786

The value of the intervention stocks was £41 million calculated at the buying price applicable at that date.

Assisted private storage	Tonnes
Butter	150

The value of this is not known as it is in commercial ownership.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the location of all the EEC warehouses and private stores used in the storage of United Kingdom and European Community agricultural produce in Wales at the latest available date; and what amount of each product is being stored in each place.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 31 January 1986 the locations and amounts of agricultural produce in intervention stores and assisted private storage in Wales are as follows:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Staff Inspector

Mr. Maxton asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed as representing the House of Commons Commission, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart on Monday 17 February, Official Report, column 6, whether the post of staff inspector was advertised among staff at present employed in the House of Commons before being advertised elsewhere; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Beith: Among the requirements of candidates for the post of staff inspector is experience of staff inspection and comparable investigatory work, including a knowledge of Civil Service job classification and grading. For this reason, exceptionally, it was not considered appropriate for this vacancy to be advertised among staff employed in the House of Commons.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Rowe asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what information he has on the money which has been raised under the business expansion scheme in each year since the scheme began, including his best estimate for 1985-86; and if he will divide the sums between (a) funds provided directly by individuals and (b) funds raised indirectly from individuals through institutions;

(2) how many applications under the business expansion scheme have been successful; how much money has been raised; and what is the proportion of successful applications as a percentage of the total number of applications.

Mr. Moore: The table gives the final estimates for companies receiving investments and the amounts invested under the scheme in 1983-84. Information for 1984-85 is not yet complete and it is too early to provide estimates for 1985-86. Information is not available on the number of companies unable to raise money under the scheme.

Living Standards

Sir Adam Butler asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the amount by which the person currently on average earnings has changed his standard of living, measured by the percentage increase in take-home pay over the increase in retail prices, since May 1979.

Mr. Lawson: For a married man on average full-time earnings, income net of income tax and national insurance contributions has increased by 12·8 per cent. in real terms since 1978-79. The corresponding increase for a single person is 13·0 per cent.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is (a) the total figure for United Kingdom public sector employment, (b) the figure for each principal Government Department and (c) the estimate for (a) and (b) for 1985; and what percentage of the total employed labour force was represented by the public sector in mid-1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. MacGregor: Total public sector employment in relation to the total employed labour force is shown in the article on public and private sector employment on page 90 of Economic Trends, December 1985.

Employment in Government Departments is shown in table 2.22 of "The Government's Expenditure Plans, 1986-87 to 1988-89."

Manpower Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was (a) the total number of civil servants employed in the United Kingdom in central Government Departments, and staff employed in local government in 1985, (b) the percentage of total population and total work force these figures represent, (c) the value of the total salaries paid to these two groups for the year and (d) the percentage of gross domestic product these salaries represent; and if he will give any information he may have as to equivalent figures in France, West Germany, the United States of America and Japan, respectively.

Mr. MacGregor: At mid-1985, the Civil Service employed 585,000 full-time staff and 23,000 part-time staff, in total 1·1 per cent. of the home population and 2·5 per cent. of the employed labour force. Total pay excluding national insurance contributions in 1985-86 is estimated to be £5·25 billion, about 1·5 per cent. of gross domestic product.

Local authorities employed 1·88 million full-time staff and 1·01 million part-timers, in total 5·1 per cent. of the home population and 11·9 per cent. of the employed labour force. No estimate is yet available of the local authority pay bill.

No comparable information is available for other countries.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Chope asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report the details of the calculations of the cost of Her Majesty's Opposition's spending proposals which he undertook to provide during the debate on the public expenditure White Paper on 20 February, Official Report, column 513.

Mr. MacGregor: The details of the Opposition spending commitments with an annual cost of £24 billion to which I referred in the debate on the public expenditure White Paper are set out in the table. The notes to the table give the relevant references to Opposition speeches and publications.

25. Pensions increased by £5 per week (single) and £8 (couple). (Hattersley, Hansard, 20 March 1985).
26. Reduction in retirement age to 60 for men. (Neil Kinnock, 24 June 1985, at TGWU conference).

27. Long term rate of supplementary benefit to unemployed after a year on benefit (Hattersley, Hansard, 20 March 1985).
28. Concessionary fares, strengthening NEDC, more grants to other bodies.

European Community (Budget)

Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the United Kingdom's net contribution to the Community budget in 1985.

Mr. Brooke: A final figure is not yet available, but the latest estimate of the United Kingdom's net contribution to the Community budget in calendar 1985 is £1,870 million.

This estimate compares with that of £1,212 million in the statement on the 1985 Community budget (Cmnd. 9633). The reasons for the abnormally high level of our net contribution during 1985 were set out in that White Paper. The latest estimate is larger than that in Cmnd. 9633 for two main reasons. First, most (£439 million) of the 1,000 mecu (£605 million) abatement payable in respect of our excessive net contribution to the 1984 Community budget was received in the first few days of 1986 rather than in 1985 as assumed in Cmnd. 9633. Secondly, our share of Community expeniture (particularly FEOGA guarantee expenditure) in 1985 was lower than expcted. In 1984, for example, our share of FEOGA guarantee receipts was about 11½ per cent.; in 1985, it was about 9½ per cent.

The United Kingdom's net contribution to the Community budget in 1986 should be very much lower than in 1985. Not only will the 1986 figure reflect the £439 million abatement received in the first few days of 1986, it will also be reduced by abatements payable in 1986 under the Fontainebleau system (and worth at least 1,400 mecu, some £900 million).

The Government's latest estimate of the United Kingdom's net payments to Community institution in 1985-86 remains at £800 million, the figure published in the latest public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9702).

Taxpayers

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish and update the table on the number of taxpayers for 1984-85 and 1985-86 on the same basis as the answer given on 25 January 1984, Official Report, columns 607-608.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 20 January 1986, c. 85.]: The latest estimates are as follows:

Thousands

	1982-83	1983-84	*1984-85	1985-86†
Number of Taxpayers	24,600	24,300	24,050	24,000
Number of taxpayers* if allowances had remained at the level of the previous year	25,800	25,600	25,050	24,850
Difference	1,200	1,300	1,000	850

* Including taxpaying wives.
† Provisional.

Budget Documents

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many copies of the Budget documents were printed in 1985; how many were sent to the Vote Office; how many were made available to commercial organisations and at what charge for each; what happened to the remainder; what was the cost to the Exchequer of producing the Budget documents; and what was the total amount recovered from commercial organisations.

Mr. Lawson: [pursuant to his reply, 26 February 1986, c. 594.]: In 1985, Her Majesty's Treasury printed 800 copies of the Budget speech, 2,000 copies of a summary of the Budget and 2,072 copies of a press notice. In addition, 1,662 copies were produced of press notices from other Government Departments. One thousand copies of the Budget summary and press notices went to the Vote Office and 150 to the Printed Paper Office. Commercial organisations were sent 180 copies of the speech, summary and press notices. They were charged £2·00, plus the HMSO charge for the financial statement and Budget report. Unused Budget documents (excluding HMSO publications) were kept in stock for a few weeks and then destroyed.

The costs to the Treasury of producing the Budget documents are not readily indentifiable from the other printing costs of the Department, but are estimated to be in the region of £3,000. All moneys received by the Treasury from the sale of publications are brought to account as appropriations in aid of the Treasury vote, class XIII, vote 4. Receipts from the sale of Budget documents are not accounted for separately and cannot be identified except at disproportionate cost.

In addition to the Treasury publications, Her Majesty's Stationery Office printed and published 9,000 copies of the 1985 financial statement and Budget report. Two thousand were sent to the Vote Office, 150 to the Printed Paper Office, and 150 to the Sale Office; 1,603 were sold to Government Departments and 4,691 were sold to other customers, including members of the public and commercial organisations; 406 copies remain in stock. The price to all customers was £5·35 per copy.

The cost of printing and publishing is borne by the HMSO trading fund which recovers its costs from net sales revenue. The Exchequer, therefore, incurs none of the costs of printing, publishing and selling—other than the purchase from HMSO of copies for the use of the Treasury and other Exchequer departments.

ENVIRONMENT

Communal Heating System

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will report on the progress of his consultations with the local authorities and other interested bodies on the supply of heat to tenants from a communal system and state when he proposes to introduce regulations giving secure tenants who are supplied heat from a communal system a right to information about the cost of their heating.

Mr. John Patten: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 25 November 1985, at column 380. Preparation of the consultation paper has proved more time-consuming than expected, but I hope that it will be ready soon.

Sewerage and Water Supply

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of industrial consumers are connected to the public sewerage system; and what is the overall figure of those industrial consumers.

Mr. John Patten: The total number of non-household consumers connected to the public sewerage system in English water authority areas is approximately 1·85 million. Of these, some 597,000 pay on the basis of a measured supply. The proportion of these consumers classed as "industrial" as opposed to "commercial" or other is not available; neither is the proportion of all industrial and/or commercial concerns connected.

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of industrial consumers are connected to a public water supply; and what is the overall figure of those consumers so connected.

Mr. John Patten: The total number of non-household consumers connected to a public water supply in English water authority areas is approximately 1·64 million (including some 345,000 supplied by the statutory water companies). Of these, just under 850,000 receive a measured supply. The proportion of these consumers classed as "industrial" as opposed to "commercial" or other is not available; neither is the proportion of all industrial and/or commercial concerns connected.

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the overall figure of households connected to a public water supply.

Mr. John Patten: The total number of households in English water authority areas connected to a public water supply (including customers of statutory water companies) is approximately 17·5 million (99 per cent. of all households).

Direct Labour Organisations

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is proposing to take to seek to safeguard the right of companies to tender against direct labour organisations.

Mrs. Rumbold: Local authorities are already required to invite tenders for all major new construction work and most minor construction and maintenance works. The Government will extend compulsory competition to a wider range of local authority services as soon as a legislative opportunity becomes available. We also remain committed to providing stronger powers to prevent authorities from frustrating the intentions of the legislation.

Water Companies

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the water companies operating in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, respectively.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested by my hon. Friend is provided for England and Wales. There are no water companies in Scotland or Northern Ireland.

Urban Housing Renewal

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those local authorities which have applied for additional housing investment programme allocations for the next financial year under the proportion of total allocations reserved for projects recommended by his Departments' urban housing renewal unit; and if he will list the projects involved.

Sir George Young: The local authorities which have bid so far for additional housing investment programme allocations related to packages of improvements developed in discussion with the urban housing renewal unit, and the projects involved, are as follows:

Radioactive Pollution

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the terms of reference of the joint committee set up between his Department and the Irish Government to study the effects of radioactive pollution from Sellafield in the Irish Sea; and if he will give the names of the members of the committee, the dates on which it has met and any conclusions that have so far emerged from its work.

Mr. Waldegrave: As I announced on 24 May 1984, at columns 462-63, in answer to the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), officials of the United Kingdom and of the Irish Republic meet regularly under the auspices of a contact group to exchange information on matters of mutual interest concerned with radioactivity of the environment. Since 1984 the group has met five times. The personnel involved at any time are selected for their knowledge and expertise in relation to the specific issues under consideration. The group does not undertake or commission studies, but on marine science more generally officials of both Governments take part in bilateral and international discussions from time to time.

Local Government

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing the total number of people employed by local authorities during each year since 1960, and the estimated total for 1984-85.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information is as follows:

Northamptonshire County Council

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the number of full-time and part-time persons employed by Northamptonshire county council at the following dates: the quarter ended March 1985, the quarter ended March 1983, the quarter ended March 1981, the quarter ended March 1979, the quarter ended March 1977, the quarter ended March 1974 and the quarter ended March 1973.

Mrs. Rumbold: The available information is as follows:

1985	10,381	10,405

Figures relating to Northamptonshire are not available before March 1980.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if any contingency plans exist for the management of radioactive wastes once the existing storage facilities at nuclear installations are filled, and in the event that no permanent disposal sites have been approved.

Mr. Waldegrave: As my right hon. Friend announced on 25 February, at columns 812-25, Government policy is that disposal facilities for low and intermediate level wastes will be provided. It is for the waste producers to ensure that adequate storage facilities are available in the interim.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the reasons for the differences in compensation payments being made to employees of the metropolitan councils on abolition, especially those between Greater Manchester, West Yorkshire and South Yorkshire; if he will give examples of redundancy payments and pensions entitlements for similar jobs in each area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The reasons for the differences in compensation entitlements stem from decisions taken by individual metropolitan county councils after the Government had announced their intention to abolish those councils and the timetable for the necessary legislation.

The Government stated in the White Paper (Cmnd. 9063) their intention to set nationally-applicable compensation terms, and subsequently announced on 1 March 1984 that the legislation would disallow any local compensation schemes introduced after that date. Despite this, three of the councils introduced local schemes before that date, and the others — West Midlands, South Yorkshire, and Tyne and Wear — introduced them afterwards.

In enacting section 53 of the Local Government Act 1985, Parliament duly disapplied the schemes introduced after 1 March 1984. The Act, however, preserves contractual rights to compensation terms obtained before that date, and therefore most Greater Manchester council, West Yorkshire county council and Merseyside county council staff in post at that date seem likely to have entitlements under the local schemes introduced by those councils.

The compensation terms under the local schemes are not identical, and it is not for my right hon. Friend to say what, if any, entitlements individual officers might have under those schemes. The Government's terms, which will apply nationally to all staff of the affected authorities who have no preserved contractual entitlements, or who opt to release them, are set out in the Local Government Reorganisation (Compensation) Regulations 1986 (S.I. 1986/151) laid before the House on 7 February. An explanatory memorandum giving guidance on these was placed in the Library on 11 February.

Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for the Environment in what form he proposes to give information to members of the public affected by the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils about the new structure of local government in those areas after 1 April.

Mr. Tracey: We have produced short factual leaflets outlining the new structure of local government in London and each of the metropolitan counties. The leaflets will be distributed to all households in the seven metropolitan areas in the next two weeks.

The leaflets, copies of which have been placed in the Library, are similar to those produced to give members of the public information about the 1974 reorganisation of local government. They describe briefly what the post-abolition structure will be, and answer some of the questions members of the public may be asking. The leaflets do not, however, attempt to provide details of the arrangements successor authorities are making for particular services. Members of the public are invited to ask their local councils for such details.

London Residuary Body

Mr. Charles Morrison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people are now employed by the London Residuary Body; and what further recruitment he expects to be undertaken.

Mr. Tracey: These are matters for the London Residuary Body.

Nature Conservation

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will withdraw circular 108/77; if he will issue a new circular to local authorities giving guidance on their role on nature conservation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Work is currently in hand to prepare a new circular, replacing circular 108/77. We expect to publish it in the spring.

Noxious Substances (Disposal)

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make it his policy to impose on local authorities a duty to assist pharmacists with the disposal of arsenic and other noxious substances.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend at present sees no need for this. Waste disposal authorities can and do already advise individual waste producers on the most suitable method of disposal of their wastes.

PRC Homes Ltd.

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects PRC Homes Ltd. to approve a repair method under the Housing Defects Act for Reema houses.

Sir George Young: I understand that a method of repair for Reema houses has been submitted to PRC Homes Ltd. for its appraisal. It is hoped this will be completed by April; I cannot, of course, prejudge the outcome.

Yorkshire Water Authority

Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what representations he has received from the Yorkshire water authority to increase the level of borrowing for the purposes of improving the water supply and the disposal of sewage in the region;

(2) what response he has now made to the request by the Yorkshire water authority to be allowed to spend more capital money.

Mr. John Patten: I have received no specific representations for the extra finance above the level of £30 million for DOE services agreed for the authority for 1985-86, but it has made a case for more in its 1985 corporate plan. In correspondence with the chairman of the authority last November, I was able to agree an increased external financing limit of £32 million for 1986-87, which I confirmed on 21 November 1985.

Council House Sales

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the annualised revenue effect on local authorities of the sale of council houses since 3 May 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The effect depends on a number of factors, including the rent which would have been payable if a house had not been sold and the amount the local authority would have spent on its management and maintenance. Information about a number of these factors is not available centrally.

Cornish Houses

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will provide extra funding to local authorities wishing to purchase Cornish houses in the ownership of the National Coal Board and which have been designated under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his answer, 27 February 1986, c. 678]: No. The Housing Defects Act imposes obligations on local authorities only in relation to private owners of defective PRC houses and these obligations have been taken into consideration in the distribution of housing investment programme allocations.

Housing Defects Act

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will hold an early meeting with the officers of the National Federation of Prefabricated Reinforced Concrete Home Owners to discuss the implementation of the Housing Defects Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his answer, 28 February 1986, c. 735]: I have received a letter on this subject from the chairman of the National Federation of PRC Home Owners and I appreciate their concerns. I shall be replying to that letter shortly.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Company Mergers

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his policy in reviewing mergers where over 80 per cent. of the market for the combining groups is overseas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Howard: In evaluating the competitive situation in individual cases my right hon. Friend has regard to the international context, to the extent of competition in the home market and to the competitive position of the United Kingdom companies in overseas markets.

Ship Propulsion

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what support he is giving to new applications of the use of wind in ship propulsion; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: Over £200,000 has been provided to industry since 1983 under the support for innovation scheme towards the cost of projects relating to wind assisted ship propulsion. A United Kingdom device which has received such support is expected to commence sea trials shortly. Wind assistance is one of the areas under consideration in the fuel efficiency part of the efficient ship programme and support for further projects will be considered if appropriate proposals are presented to the Department.

BL (Privatisation)

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, pursuant to the reply of 24 February, Official Report, columns 421-22, he will list the people, together with their position in the company, who are conducting negotiations with General Motors on behalf of BL; what specific assurances Government officials are seeking from General Motors regarding the future of the relevant Land Rover-Leyland business under General Motors ownership; if he will undertake to meet trade union delegations prior to any agreement with General Motors being ratified; and if he will now say what role General Motors World Truck is playing in the talks.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Under the direction of the BL board, commercial negotiations with GM are being conducted principally by Mr. N. J. Carver, Director of Business Strategy, BL plc, Mr. C. R. Lyddon, Director, Finance and Audit, BL plc, and Mr. H. A. Rose, Director Finance and Planning, Land Rover-Leyland Ltd.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry told the House on 3 February, General Motors are being asked to give undertakings that the majority of the products sold by the businesses involved would be manufactured in the Unied Kingdom, that the products would continue to have a high local content, that there would be a substantial level of exports, that research and development facilities would be maintained and developed in the United Kingdom, that Land Rover would retain its distinct British identity, and that an appropriate level of investment would be injected into the business to achieve competitive future models and facilities.

I have myself met a number of trade union delegations to explain the current position. I remain very willing to meet further trade union delegations from BL and GM at any time.

Should an agreement with General Motors be concluded, it would, of course, be for the management to determine its product range. The R & D resources of GM, including their work on a world truck for the next decade would be available to the combined business.

Wine Sales

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list the options he has under consideration relating to securing the sale of wine in prescribed quantities following his recent survey of the level of compliance with the code of conduct agreed by his Department and the trade; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what steps he has taken to inform all leading representatives of the licensed trade of the low compliance with the code of conduct on the sales of wine by measured glass, agreed with them two years ago; and if notice has been given that legislation on this matter is now being considered.

Mr. Howard: In the light of the results of the surveys carried out by local authorities to ascertain levels of compliance with the trade's voluntary code of practice for sales of wine by the glass, the Department will shortly be inviting the trade sponsors of the code to discuss the difficulties which their members have experienced in adopting its provisions and the ways in which observance of the code could be made more widespread.

The other options under consideration include legislation to introduce a range of prescribed standard sizes or to require wine to be sold by reference to volume without the restriction of a prescribed range.

However, legislation would not be justified until the possibility of a voluntary solution has been exhausted.

Daya Nuclear Power Plant

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, further to his written answer of 12 February, Official Report, column 487, on what occasions since 1979 bank officials involved in financing export projects have been required to sign declarations under the Official Secrets Act; and what aspects of the Daya project were thought to be so confidential as to require this form of protection.

Mr. Butcher: As far as my Department is aware, there have been no such previous occasions since 1979. As I said on 12 February, this project entails an exceptional degree of direct involvement by the British, French and Chinese Governments in complex negotiations.

Tractors

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of British tractor requirements have been fulfilled by imports from overseas countries over the last 15 years on a year to year basis.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information available is shown in the table.

Import Penetration of the Products of the Wheeled Tractor Industry (Activity Heading 3212 of the Standard Industrial Classification)

	Percentage
1978	45½
1979	43
1980	51
1981	45½
1982	49
1983	48½
1984	48½

Cammell Laird

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the original deadline for bids for Vickers Cammell Laird yard; on what basis and on what terms an extension was granted and to whom; what steps he took to satisfy himself that such an extension would enable commercial confidentiality to be maintained for other bids; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Officers

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) why new prison officers are being issued with different articles of uniform than those used by existing staff;

(2) what is the present waiting time for prison officers to be supplied with replacements for worn items of uniform;

(3) what is the present waiting time for the replacement of boots and shoes issued to prison officers.

Mr. Mellor: I will write to the hon. Member.

Immigration

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the nature of the immigration service and police investigation at Liberty's in Regent street on 30 January 1985; and what was the immigration status of those interviewed or detained as a result.

Mr. Waddington: The visit to Liberty's department store on 30 January 1986 was initiated by the Metropolitan police to investigate suspected offences of theft. It was believed that certain of those whom the police intended to interview were subject to immigration control and it was therefore agreed that two members of the immigration service should attend to assist if questions of identity or immigration status arose.

A total of 19 persons were arrested. Five were subsequently charged with working in breach of conditions of leave to enter or remain, three were found to be illegal entrants and one was charged with overstaying. The others, though subject to immigration control, were not prohibited from taking employment and were accepted as lawfully present in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the dates and places since 30 March 1984 where major joint immigration-police operations were carried out in the whole of the United Kingdom; how many police officers and immigration officers, and of what rank, were involved for each operation; how many people, and of what nationalities, were (a) interviewed and (b) detained in each operation, for how long and where; and with regard to what breaches of immigration law these people were interviewed or charged.

Mr. Waddington: There have been no major joint operations specifically planned to investigate illegal entrants and overstayers since 30 March 1984.

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many immigrants from India, refused full entry to the United Kingdom, but admitted temporarily, apply on return to India to enter the United Kingdom as a fiancé or husband.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested is not available centrally.

Prisoners (Legal Aid)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of adjudications heard in prisons in the United Kingdom for which legal advice had been granted to prisoners in the presentation of their case during 1985.

Mr. Mellor: Approximately 70 prisoners were legally represented at adjudications completed by boards of visitors in 1985. A prisoner may request legal advice about an adjudication at any stage and such requests are routinely granted, but are not centrally recorded.

Prison Employees (Security Clearance)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average time taken for security clearance for a person seeking to obtain employment within Her Majesty's prisons.

Mr. Hurd: A number of inquiries into health, previous employment and other matters need to be made simultaneously before anyone is offered a post in Her Majesty's prisons. Timescales vary so much that to give an average would be meaningless.

Suicides

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the number of suicides in prisons in the United Kingdom during each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: The number of prisoners adjudged by inquests as having committed suicide in prison custody is as follows:

	Number
1981	16
1982	18
1983	*21
1984	*23
1985	†21

* Including in each year one prisoner who died in an outside hospital as a result of a suicide attempt before his reception into prison custody.

† Inquest verdicts on 16 prisoners who died in custody during 1985 are still awaited; some of these are likely to be verdicts of suicide.

Prisoners (AIDS)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of inmates at present in prison in the United Kingdom who have been diagnosed as having acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Mellor: We have received no report of a current case of diagnosed AIDS in the prison population of England and Wales. The position in Scotland and Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Police (Disciplinary Action)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what disciplinary action is taken by the Metropolitan police in the case of police officers who are successfully sued for assault.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Police officers convicted of any criminal offence are liable to then be charged with the police disciplinary offence of criminal conduct. It may occasionally happen that civil proceedings are successfully brought against the police in respect of events which have not previously been the subject of criminal or disciplinary proceedings. In such circumstances, it is the practice of the Metropolitan police to review the case to see whether it is right for further investigation to take place, having regard to the evidence given in the civil proceedings, the lapse of time since the incident and the different standards of proof in civil proceedings on the one hand, and in criminal or disciplinary proceedings on the other.

Satellite Broadcasting

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will require the Independent Broadcasting Authority to ensure compatibility in dish receivers and television sets between contractors granted licences for direct broadcasting by satellite; and what other measures he has in mind to promote standardisation in these areas.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The IBA will be the broadcaster of the services and will therefore be responsible for control of the transmissions in accordance with the terms of the world broadcasting-satellite administrative radio conference of 1977. Other matters such as hardware compatibility will not be the responsibility of the IBA. It is, however, envisaged that all three channels will be broadcast on the same transmission standard. It will be in the interests of the television set and antennae manufacturing industries to reach common standards in order to secure a wide market for their products and we believe that this will be achieved through the normal channels of cooperation within the industries.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has had any proposals from the British Broadcasting Corporation for direct broadcasting by satellite; what is his assessment of the implications for the British Broadcasting Corporation of his announcement on 21 February about direct broadcasting by satellite and the Independent Broadcasting Authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: In 1982 the Government approved plans for the British Broadcasting Corporation to provide direct broadcasting by satellite service on two of the five channels allocated to the United Kingdom under international agreement. Later it became clear that the cost and risk of such a project were too high to be borne by the BBC alone, and in May 1984 the Government approved arrangements for the BBC to take a 50 per cent. share in a wider consortium which included the independent television companies and other companies in the electronics and entertainment field, with a view to providing three DBS channels under the terms of sections 42 to 44 of the Cable and Broadcasting Act 1984. In June 1985 the consortium concluded that the proposed arrangements would not create a viable commercial proposition and the project was abandoned.

If the IBA proposals prove successful, the new service is unlikely to become operational in less than three to four years. Since consumers will need to buy or rent additional equipment in order to receive the service, the audience is expected to build up only gradually. We do not, therefore, expect the service to make an impact on the existing pattern of broadcasting for some years. When the new service has been operational for at least three years, we shall consider the assignment of the two remaining channels which are available to the United Kingdom, and in doing so, we shall, of course, take account of the views of the BBC.

Prisoners (Discharge Grants)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many, and what proportion of, prisoners leaving Liverpool, Birmingham, Pentonville, Manchester, Holloway, Bullwood Hall and Rochester prisons in any recent convenient period received discharge grants; how many of these were male and female, respectively; how many were aged 21 years and over and how many were under 21 years; how many in each category received the higher rate of discharge grant given to homeless offenders; and for what reasons some prisoners were ineligible for a discharge grant.

Mr. Mellor: The statistical information is not available centrally and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

The discharge grant replaces the supplementary benefit which a prisoner could otherwise have claimed from the DHSS for the first week after release and the criteria for eligibility are broadly similar. In addition, discharge grants are not paid to the following:

(i) those serving sentences of 14 days imprisonment or less;
(ii) fine defaulters;
(iii) civil prisoners;
(iv) unconvicted and unsentenced prisoners;
(v) those prisoners remanded in custody who are later dealt with and discharged from magistrates courts.

M25 (Surrey)

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in the light of the established traffic flows, he will now reconsider the classification of the M25 in Surrey, as a rural motorway for policing purposes.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We do not use such a classification for the purpose of assessing police manpower needs.

Leeds Prison

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to visit Leeds prison.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend has no present plans to do so. My right hon. Friend last visited Her Majesty's prison Leeds on 11 January 1984 when he was Minister of State and my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State visited on 28 August 1985.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make available in the Library of the House the form or forms which will have to be completed with (a) a project and (b) a personal licence application in respect of animal experimentation.

Mr. Mellor: Application forms for both personal and project licences are in preparation, and will in due course be published in an appendix to the Home Office guidance note which has already been made available in draft form.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what checks will be carried out upon the details contained in all application forms for (a) a project licence and (b) a personal licence in respect of animal experimentation.

Mr. Mellor: Under clause 9(1) of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Bill, my right hon. Friend, before granting an application for a personal or project licence, must consult an inspector, and may also consult an assessor or the Animal Procedures Committee, or both. All applications will be closely scrutinised.

Mr. R (Reference No. R266303/2(S))

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, pursuant to the letter from the Minister of State, Home Office to the hon. Member for Stretford dated 20 February concerning the refusal of leave to enter the United Kingdom of Mr. R. reference No. R266303/2(S), he will explain Government policy towards visitors who arrive for no particular family or other reason.

Mr. Waddington: The policy towards persons who seek leave to enter the United Kingdom as visitors is set out in paragraph 17 of the Immigration Rules (H.C. 169 as amended). I will write further to the hon. Member about the case to which his question refers.

Fraud

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) of the cases of fraud reported to the Metropolitan police company fraud department since 1979, (i) how many in each year were subsequently reported to the Department of Trade and Industry and (ii) of the cases subsequently reported to the Department of Trade and Industry how many in each year resulted in prosecutions by the relevant prosecuting solicitor's department; and how many were successful in each instance;

(2) of the cases of fraud reported to the Metropolitan police company fraud department since 1979, (i) how many cases in each year were subsequently reported to the relevant prosecuting solicitor's department and (ii) of the cases subsequently reported to the relevant prosecuting solicitor's department, how many in each year resulted in prosecutions conducted by that department; and how many were successful in each instance;

(3) of the cases of fraud reported to the Metropolitan police company fraud department in each year since 1979, (i) how many cases in each year were subsequently reported to the Director of Public Prosecutions and (ii) of the cases subsequently reported to the Director of Public Prosecutions how many in each year resulted in prosecutions conducted by the Director of Public Prosecutions; and how many were successful in each instance;

(4) of the cases of fraud reported to the Metropolitan police company fraud department since 1979, (i) how many cases were referred to them by the Department of Trade and Industry and (ii) how many cases in each year were referred to them by the Director of Public Prosecutions;

(5) how many cases of fraud were reported to the Metropolitan police company fraud department in each year since 1979;

(6) of the cases of fraud reported to the City of London police fraud squad in each year since 1979, (i) how many in each year were subsequently reported to the Director of Public Prosecutions and (ii) of the cases subsequently reported to the Director of Public Prosecutions how many in each year resulted in prosecutions conducted by the Director of Public Prosecutions; and how many were successful;

(7) of the cases of fraud reported to the City of London police fraud squad since 1979, (i) how many cases in each year were referred to it by the Department of Trade and Industry and (ii) how many cases in each year were referred to it by the Director of Public Prosecutions;

(8) how many cases of fraud were reported to the City of London police fraud squad in each year since 1979;

(9) of the cases of fraud reported to the City of London police fraud squad in each year since 1979, (a) how many in each year were subsequently reported to the relevant prosecuting solicitor's department and (b) of the cases so reported to the relevant prosecuting solicitor's department, how many in each year resulted in prosecutions conducted by the relevant prosecuting solicitor's department; and how many were successful in each instance;

(10) of the cases of fraud reported to the City of London police fraud squad in each year since 1979, how many in each year were subsequently reported to the Department of Trade and Industry and of the cases subsequently reported to the Department of Trade and Industry how many in each year resulted in prosecutions conducted by the relevant prosecuting solicitor's department; and how many were successful in each instance.

Mr. Mellor: I will reply as soon as possible.

Crime

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will give a breakdown for each borough or police district in London of the numbers of (a) sexual offences broken down into (i) rape, (ii) assault on females and (iii) assault on males, (b) burglary broken down into (i) residential property, (ii) commercial property and (iii) motor vehicles, (c) motor vehicle crime broken down into (i) theft, (ii) damage and (iii) theft from vehicles and (d) theft broken down into (i) from the person, (ii) from domestic property and (iii) other thefts;

(2) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on the number of reported crimes of (a) murder, (b) manslaughter, (c) death by dangerous driving, (d) wounding, (e) assault, (f) mugging and (g) robbery with a firearm in each borough or police district in London; and if he will give details of the number of each of the crimes cleared up;

(3) if he will give a breakdown for each borough or police district in London of the numbers of victims of (a) robbery, (b) woundings and (c) serious assault by (i) age and (ii) sex.

Mr. Mellor: I would refer the right hon. Member to the replies given to questions from my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) on 7 February at columns 295-300.

Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will establish an acquired immune deficiency syndrome wing within one particular prison, to which all prisoners who have, or who are believed to have, acquired immune deficiency symdrome may be sent.

Mr. Mellor: It is planned to convert part of the hospital complex at Brixton prison to use as an isolation unit for the care of patients suffering from infectious disease including AIDS. Prisoners who are diagnosed as HTLV III antibody positive but who have no AIDS symptoms will not be considered for transfer to the unit.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning the arrangements for the custody of a prisoner at Leicester prison whose blood contains acquired immune deficiency syndrome antibodies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Representations have been received from the Prison Officers' Association about aspects of the management of prisoners who are diagnosed as HTLV III antibody positive or who are undergoing tests for viral infectivity. Guidance on this subject has been issued to governors and medical officers of all Prison Department establishments after consultation with the association at national level. Decisions in individual cases are taken by local management in the light of that guidance. For reasons of medical confidentiality I am unable to comment on specific cases.

Print Dispute (Wapping)

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many further arrests were made at Wapping in connection with the print dispute in the period 24 February to 2 March.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of the Metropolis a further 51 arrests were made in the period from 2 pm on 24 February to 11 am on 3 March.

West Yorkshire Fire Service

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will increase the Government's contribution to the budget of the West Yorkshire fire service.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. It is not open to my right hon. Friend to vary the block grant contribution made to the authority.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make further finance available to enable West Yorkshire fire service to update its equipment.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. The precept limit prescribed for 1986-87 for the West Yorkshire fire and civil defence authority took account of the normal requirement for a fire brigade to replace equipment.

Fire Brigade Officers

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department at what date fire brigade officers can expect to be equipped with new fireproof clothing and equipment.

Mr. Giles Shaw: A committee of the Central Fire Brigades Advisory Council keeps specifications of clothing and equipment under continuing review to ensure that recommended standards, including fire resistance, provide the maximum possible safety to firefighters.

Prisons (Yorkshire and Humberside)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what improvements the redsignation of prisons in Yorkshire and Humberside will bring for young offenders;

(2) what representations he has had from the Prison Officers' Association, Thorp Arch branch, on the redesignation of prisons in Yorkshire and Humberside; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what alternatives he has considered to the reallocation of juvenile offenders away from Thorp Arch remand centre;

(4) if young offenders will be held in the same prisons as adult offenders as a result of the redesignation of prisons in Yorkshire and Humberside.

Mr. Mellor: The under-21-year-old population previously accommodated in Her Majesty's remand centre Thorp Arch will now be divided between Her Majesty's prison Leeds and Her Majesty's prison and remand centre Hull. Those in Hull will be in a discrete unit holding all those aged under 17 previously in Thorp Arch. Those in Leeds will be held in exactly the same conditions as those previously held there for lack of places in Thorp Arch, every effort being made to keep them separate from adults though it cannot be guaranteed that they will be kept apart at all times.

These changes form part of a package designed to relieve the acute overcrowding at Leeds by converting Hull from a dispersal prison to a local prison and remand centre and Thorp Arch from a remand centre to an adult training prison. Various other options, including one proposal by the Prison Officers' Association at Thorp Arch, were considered but were unsuitable because they would have left the north region with insufficient places for long-term category C prisoners, thus preventing the conversion of Hull and the relief of overcrowding at Leeds.

Many of the prisoners aged under 21 who are being relocated will benefit from being in establishments which are easier for their families and legal advisers to visit.

Mr. Norman Davis

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to reply to the letter of 23 January from the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill, about the delay in informing Mr. Norman Davis about the results of his parole board hearing in 1984.

Mr. Mellor: I wrote to the hon. Member on 28 February.

Immigration Control

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what response he has made to the Commission for Racial Equality's report on immigration control procedures; and if he will place a copy of his response in the Library.

Mr. Waddington: I have sent a detailed response to the chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality. I am arranging for copies to be placed in the Library.

Afan Valley

Mr. John Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is proposing to take any steps to seek to improve television reception in the Afan valley; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: There are some localities in the Afan valley where, because of the terrain, television reception is non-existent or poor. The BBC/IBA joint UHF engineering programme is designed to extend television coverage to unserved communities of 200 persons or more; and I understand that the IBA, which takes the lead on engineering matters in this area, is considering the case for additional relays under that programme.

PRIME MINISTER

Working Population (Statistics)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister what is (a) the average cost of social security payments in the United Kingdom per head of the working population and (b) the average amount of income tax paid in the United Kingdom per head of the working population.

The Prime Minister: In 1985-86 the cost of social security payments is expected to be £40·6 billion and the working population is 27·5 million. The cost of social security is met from a mixture of taxation and contribution income; if this was ascribed exclusively to the working population, their average share of the cost would be £1,480.

The total amount of income tax to be paid in 1985-86 by taxpayers under the age of 65 is estimated to be £31·2 billion. Divided amongst the working population, this gives an average payment of £1,130.

Civil Service and Local Government

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister what was the number of persons full and part time (a) in the Civil Service and (b) in local government in the United Kingdom in June 1979 and June 1985 and, in each case, showing the reduction of persons employed in percentage terms and numerically.

The Prime Minister: The figures are as follows:

thousands

	*Civil Service	Local authorities†
1979
Full time	709	1,980
Part time	30	1,020
Total	739	3,000
1985
Full time	585	1,880
Part time	23	1,010
Total	608	2,890
Change	−131	−110
(per cent)	(−18)	(−4)

* At 1 July; part-time staff are counted as ½ units in the Civil Service Manpower counts.

† To nearest 10,000.

Managers (Qualifications)

Dr. Marek asked the Prime Minister what measures Her Majesty's Government are taking to increase the percentage of managers in British industry who have graduate qualifications and, in particular, business or management qualifications.

The Prime Minister: The Government recognise the importance of increasing the proportion of managers with appropriate further and higher education qualifications. Between 1979 and 1984 the number of graduates going into industry and commerce increased by over 25 per cent. Over the same period the number of higher education students taking courses in management and business studies, including accountancy, rose from over 22,000 to over 31,000, an increase of over 40 per cent.

The Government's Green Paper "The Development of Higher Education into the 1990s"—May 1985—declared the intention of shifting the balance of qualifications and courses in favour of those with a relevance to industry and commerce.

Particular importance is attached to the updating and development of existing managers, through such means as the Department of Education and Science's PICKUP programme and part-time qualifications offered by universities, polytechnics, colleges and private sector institutions.

Principal Civil Service Pension Scheme

Mr. Meacher asked the Prime Minister what changes she plans to make in and relating to the principal Civil Service pension scheme consequent upon enactment of the Social Security Bill.

The Prime Minister: The principal civil service pension scheme (PCSPS) will be amended as necessary to comply with the requirements introduced by the Bill that relate to occupational pension schemes. These requirements will not apply to schemes until 1 April 1988, and the detailed implications for the PCSPS will be considered in due course in consultation with the Civil Service trade unions.

State Retirement Pension

Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister whether, in view of the judgment of the European Court of Justice in the case of Miss Helen Marshall, she will introduce legislation to reform the rules of age eligibility for the basic state retirement pension so that they are flexible between 60 and 65 years and equal between men and women.

The Prime Minister: The judgment of the European Court of Justice in the case of Miss Helen Marshall, a public servant, was concerned with the age at which she must leave work rather than eligibility for retirement pensions. The Government's stated aim is for greater flexibility in pension age, which would allow individual choice, and the recent Green Paper on Reform of Social Security (Cmnd. 9518) sought views on possible ways of achieving this. However, none of the responses to the Green Paper suggested solutions which would not place an unacceptable burden on the economy. As stated in the White Paper on Reform of Social Security (Cmnd. 9691), the Government will continue to examine possible ways in which greater flexibility might be achieved.

Cabinet Office Staff

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Prime Minister if she will list in the Official Report the name and rank of all Cabinet Office staff in all Departments at the level of senior principal and above.

The Prime Minister: The names and ranks of all Cabinet Office staff at grade 6—equivalent to senior principal—and above serving in the Department are listed in the Civil Service Year Book, a copy of which is in the Library. Four members of the staff of the Cabinet Office (Management and Personnel Office) at grade 6 or above are on loan to other Departments—one each to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise, Her Majesty's Treasury, the Ministry of Defence and the Registry of Friendly Societies.

Sunday Trading

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to the answer of 28 January, Official Report, column 438, to the hon. Member for Leicester, East, how many representations have been received by her office and by other Government Departments (a) in favour of and (b) against the proposed legislation on Sunday trading.

The Prime Minister: The Government have received about 800 representations in favour of our proposals and about 40,000 against since the debate on the Auld report in the House of Commons in May last year.

Medical Equipment Industry (Report)

Mr. Wainwright asked the Prime Minister by what date the Advisory Council for Applied Research and Develpment's working group on the medical equipment industry has been asked to make its report.

The Prime Minister: The working group is expected to report in April. Its report will be to the council in the first instance.

Overseas Aid

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Prime Minister if she will publish in the Official Report the letter to her from the hon. Member for Monklands, West of 11 February and her reply to him of 27 February relating to figures for overseas aid.

The Prime Minister: Yes.

11 February 1986

Dear Prime Minister,

I am concerned about an apparent discrepancy between your reply to me in the House of Commons last October and published material from the Overseas Development Administration. Perhaps you could clarify the position for me.

After your statement on the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting on 29 October, I asked about Britain's plans to meet the UN target for aid spending of 0·7 per cent. of GNP (Hansard, col. 821). You replied as follows:

> 'The United Kingdom aid programme, at 0·33 per cent. of GDP, is close to the OECD average, which is 0·36 per cent. of GDP. To that has to be added the considerable private flows. Taking the official and private flows together, the United Kingdom figure is 1·25 per cent. of GNP, which is well above the United Nations target of 1 per cent.'

However, the ODA annual review, British Overseas Aid 1984 which was published in July, said that total flows had now fallen to 0·89 per cent., incidentally the first time that I can remember them dropping below the 1 per cent. target.

I would be glad to know which of these figures is, in fact, correct.

Yours sincerely,
Tom Clarke.

27 February 1986

Dear Mr. Clarke,

Thank you for your letter of 11 February about overseas aid. You are of course quite right to point out that the 1984 figure for total flows, both official and private, from this country were 0·89 per cent. of GNP. The figure of 1·25 per cent. to which I referred reflected the approximate position in 1982 and 1983. The point I was seeking to make is that when one looks at private flows as well as official flows this country has a particularly good record.

Your sincerely,
Margaret Thatcher,

SCOTLAND

Highlands and Islands Development Board

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye, 17 February, Official Report, column 17, he will give a breakdown of the real terms change by 13 per cent. of the proposed level of grant-in-aid provisions for the Highlands and Islands Development Board in 1986-87 compared with the total for 1985-86, indicating the cash and percentage reduction due to (a) the impending completion of the integrated development programme for the Western Isles, (b) any special payments to the board associated with the Invergordon enterprise zone, (c) any anticipation for profits which the board was anticipating to receive from the realisation of any shareholdings and (d) the net real term reduction in proposed grant-in-aid provision compared with 1985-86.

Mr. John MacKay: (a) the reduction in grant-in-aid between 1985-86 and 1986-87 is £1,529,000 at estimated 1985-86 prices: this represents 5 per cent. of the total grant in aid provision for 1985-86. The statement in my previous answer to the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye that the reduction was mainly due to the impending completion of the Western Isles integrated development programme related to the reductions in cash terms which represents 4·9 per cent. of the total reduction of 9·7 per cent.

(b) none; the last of the special payments associated with the Invergordon enterprise zone was paid to the board in 1984-85.

(c) none; estimated receipts are taken into account in setting the level of grant-in-aid but it is the cash proceeds from the sale of shares and not the profits which count for this purpose.

(d) the net reduction at estimated 1985-86 prices is £4,076,000 which represents 13 per cent. of the total grant-in-aid provision for 1985-86.

Community Service

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will commission a study to establish the number and proportion of cases in which a community service order has been recommended by a court but in which no place has been available on a community service order scheme.

Mr. Rifkind: Since 1979 steady progress has been naintained in developing community service schemes which now exist in all regions covering most of the densely populated areas. I hope that, subject to compliance with aggregrate expenditure planning figures, local authorities will continue to develop community service with the assistance of the specific grant paid by the Government. Authorities may find it helpful to undertake local assessments but I see no need at present for a national study of the kind proposed by the hon. Member.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the total cost of the community service order scheme in each year for which records are available; and what proportion of that cost has been met by Exchequer contribution in each of these years.

Mr. Rifkind: The costs of community service by offender schemes operated by local authorities in terms of the Community Service by Offenders (Scotland) Act 1978, giving the total and proportional costs between the Exchequer and local authorities, are detailed below. The rate of Exchequer grant is 80 per cent.

Years	Local Authority £	Exchequer £	Total £
1980-81	*64,000	257,238	*321,238
1981-82	*157,000	630,588	*788,588
1982-83	195,506	782,022	977,528
1983-84	252,412	1,009,649	1,262,061
1984-85	324,428	1,297,712	1,622,140

* Estimated.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many community service orders have been made by sheriff courts in each of the last four years for which records are available.

Mr. Rifkind: The information is set out in the table below:

Year	Community Service Orders	Community Service as a Condition of Probation
1981	1,070	141
1982	1,910	110
1983	1,958	90
1984	2,354	129

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland which sheriff courts are not able to make community service orders.

Mr. Rifkind: Community service schemes are drawn up and operated by local authority social work departments. Schemes exist in all sheriff court districts with the exception of the following: Dumfries, Kirkcudbright, Stranraer, Oban, Rothesay, Dunnoon and Campbeltown.

The making of orders relating to individual offenders depends on a number of factors, including the nature of the offence and the availability of a suitable placement and supervising staff.

College Closures and Mergers

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will specify what savings were made by closing (a) Callendar Park college of education, (b) Hamilton college of education and by the merger of Notre Dame and Craiglockhart colleges into one college.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his answer, 13 February, c. 504-5.]: Capital receipts of £270,000 in 1982-83 and £410,000 in 1983-84 accrued from the sale of the former Hamilton college of education and £1·4 million will be realised in 1986-87 as the Exchequer's share of the proceeds from the sale of the former Craiglockhart college of education. Part of the former Callendar Park college of education is at present occupied by the Forth Valley health board it is expected that this accommodation will be vacated early in 1987, after which it is intended to dispose of the property.

In 1983-84, the first complete year following the closures and merger in question, an estimated overall saving of £2·3 million on grant-aided expenditure accured from the reduction in the number of colleges of education.

In the same financial year, offsetting expenditure of £1·5 million was incurred on compensation payments to staff made redundant at the colleges affected.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Disabled People (Representations)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why no consultation concerning the provisions of the Disabled Persons (Services Consultation and Representation) Bill has been initiated with the National Federation of the Blind; and if he will make a statement on the criteria for selection used by his Department for these consultations.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to my replies to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) on 14 February at columns 596-97 and to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) on 26 February at column 623.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) why, in relation to the limited list, general practitioners are required to prescribe by a generic name in cases where there is only a branded drug available;

(2) why, in relation to the limited list, general practitioners are required to prescribe by generic name only, when there are clinically similar branded products at the same or lower price.

Mr. Hayhoe: On 18 March 1985 during the debate in the House on the regulations introducing the selected list scheme, my right hon. Friend explained that, wherever possible, the generic rather than the branded name of a particular drug should be used on prescription forms. The purpose was to encourage other manufacturers to market their own generic versions of branded drugs; and to introduce an element of price competition into the supply of medicines for which the promotion of brand names was the main determinant.

Pharmacists (Remuneration)

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what action is being taken to seek to ensure that individual chemists are not being remunerated at National Health Service list prices when they have bought products at substantial discounts on this price;

(2) what action is being taken to prevent chemists forming their own limited companies to import products at below list price and then invoice themselves at full National Health Service list price to comply with clause 4(1) of the Drug Tariff.

Mr. Hayhoe: Retail pharmacists receive the actual wholesale cost of the drugs used in dispensing National Health Service prescriptions, less a stratified average discount which they are deemed to be able to obtain from their own source of supply, which can be through the normal wholesale distribution network, their own limited companies or direct from a manufacturer.

The amount of the discount deduction is established by periodic statistical inquiries. The last such inquiry took place in 1981. My Department has already initiated discussions with the pharmacists' representatives, the Pharmaceutical Services Negotiating Committee, on the early conduct of a further inquiry which would identify all the various forms of discount available in the market. This will include both domestic and imported drugs.

Child Benefit

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will introduce an augmented level of child benefit to recompense parents whose children take sizes of clothing or shoes which attract value added tax liability.

Mr. Newton: Child benefit has always been regarded as a general contribution towards the cost of bringing up a child. There are no plans to change this approach.

Cambridge and Huntingdon Health Authorities

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the amount in real terms allocated to Cambridge health authority and Huntingdon health authority in 1985; and how this compares with that allocated in 1979.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not collected centrally. My hon. Friend may care to contact the chairman of the East Anglian regional health authority.

Severe Weather Allowance Claims

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claims for additionally exceptional severe weather allowance were made from individuals within Scotland during the period 31 December 1985 to 5 January 1986; and if he will provide a geographical breakdown by region.

Mr. Newton: Separate information is not collected on the number of claims. Information on payments awarded is not yet available, as I explained in my reply to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on 24 February at column 470.

Pensioner Households

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pensioners in receipt of supplementary benefit are classified as householders, and how many as non-householders.

Mr. Major: I refer my hon. Friend to table 5.1 of the "Annual Statistical Enquiry 1983", a copy of which is in the Library.

Hip Replacement Operations

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average delay in hip replacement operations in the south-west region of England.

Mr. Whitney: The estimated median interval between a date a patient was placed on the waiting list and the time of admission to National Health Service hospitals in the South Western regional health authority for operations for total hip replacement and other arthroplasty of hip in 1983, the latest year for which information is held centrally, was 31 weeks.

Special Heating Allowance

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has had from Age Concern about granting a special heating allowance to elderly and disabled people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We received a representation from the director of Age Concern on 26 February asking the Government to declare that exceptionally severe weather had occurred nationally and to instruct local DHSS offices to make payments to those eligible. Ministers have no power to do this: the decision whether, for the purposes of the relevant single payments regulation, there has been a period of exceptionally severe weather in any particular area is one for the local adjudication officer, in the light of local weather conditions. I am glad to say, however, that adjudication officers in the majority of local offices have now decided that the weather in their areas has been exceptionally severe.

Private Health Services

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the involvement of his Department in checking services and standards in private hospitals that are run by overseas companies operating in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is the present number of private hospitals in the United Kingdom which are owned and run by foreign companies; and if he will list them;

(3) what are the requirements of his Department for any foreign company wishing to set up private health services in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: In England, my right hon. Friend's responsibility for registering and inspecting private hospitals to ensure that standards are maintained is delegated to district health authorities. My Department's role is limited to informing authorities of changes to legislation and giving guidance on the provisions. For certain types of hospital development, authorisation from my Department must be sought, and for others notification must be given to my Department. Private hospitals approved under the Abortion Act 1967 are subject to control and inspection by my Department. There are no special requirements of my Department for foreign companies. Information on ownership and nationality of companies is not collected.

In Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, private hospitals are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State.

Smoking

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any further plans for funds to be made available for health education on smoking.

Mr. Whitney: I hope additional funds will be provided for this purpose in 1986-87.

Tobacco Advertising

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any future plans for further restrictions on tobaccco advertising, promotion and sponsorship.

Mr. Whitney: The voluntary agreements with the tobacco industry governing these matters are currently under discussion.

Heating Allowances (South-West England)

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance is given to the area office in the south-west in dealing with heating allowances in districts in the region with different climatic characteristics; and if, in particular, he will indicate guidance given in respect of (a) Plymouth and (b) Dartmoor.

Mr. Newton: The main guidance on determining entitlement to regular weekly heating additions under the supplementary benefit scheme is contained in the "S Manual", a copy of which is in the Library.

Revised guidance on assessing entitlement to single payments to meet the cost of extra fuel used because of a period of exceptionally severe weather was issued by the Chief Adjudication Officer on 6 December 1985.

On 27 February the Chief Adjudication Officer issued new guidance which highlights recent weather conditions and was expected to assist adjudication officers still considering their decision. The December guidance is already in the Library and I have placed a copy of this new advice there also. A period of exceptionally severe weather has now been designated in the great majority of local office areas, paving the way for help to be given to claimants with their extra fuel costs. Local offices have been asked to give this work priority.

Guidance is issued on a national basis, and does not vary between regions or individual local offices.

Supplementary Benefit Claimants

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will state the average value of work expenses currently disregarded when calculating the resources of supplementary benefit claimants; and if he will list the maximum and minimum values of such expenses;

(2) if he has any plans to discontinue the work expenses disregard when calculating the resources of income support claimants.

Mr. Newton: As the White Paper, "Reform of Social Security: Programme for Action" (Cmnd. 9691) makes clear at paragraphs 3.37 to 3.39, it is proposed to adopt a more standard approach to the assessment of earnings for income-related benefits. This approach is consistent with the objective of aligning the rules for help in income support, housing benefit and family credit and will mean that earnings will be assessed on a net basis, without allowing deductions for work expenses. In recognition of this, it is proposed that the present supplementary benefit £4 earnings disregard be increased to £5 a week under income support. In addition, an improved disregard of £15 a week will be introduced for lone parents, disabled people and couples who have been unemployed for two years.

Information is not collected on what amounts or types of expenses are deducted for work expenses at present but I would expect most such part-time work to be undertaken locally. Some information on the average work expenses of lone parents is contained in a study* carried out by the social policy research unit of the University of York in 1982. It showed that the average weekly costs of travel to work and child care for the minority of lone parents on supplementary benefit who had part-time work were £1·18 and £0·94 respectively.

Maternal Deaths

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Caernarfon on 27 January, Official Report, columns 388-9, when he expects the triennial report on maternal deaths for 1979 to 1981 to be published; and if it will include data on maternal deaths following caesarian sections.

Mr. Whitney: It is expected that this report will be published at the end of April. It will include data on deaths associated with Caesarian sections which occurred during the three-year period 1979 to 1981.

Blindness (Disability Premium)

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are his plans on the entitlement in Scotland to the disability premium for blindness for the planned income support scheme and housing benefit schemes.

Mr. Newton: Blindness will entitle a claimant to the proposed disability premium for income support in Scotland as in England and Wales. Blind people will similarly receive a higher entitlement for help with their housing costs under the new housing benefit scheme.

Cost Improvement Programmes

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if it remains his policy that each individual health district, including inner city districts, will retain the full benefit of its cost improvement programme.

Mr. Whitney: It remains our policy that the benefit of cost improvement programmes should be retained locally. The detailed application of this policy is a matter for regional and district heath authorities. In some cases individual districts retain the full benefit of their cost improvements; in others, for example, regions may require districts to contribute an agreed level of cash-releasing cost improvements to a regional development fund for redistribution, but allow them to retain all cost improvements achieved over and above this level.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all hospitals currently under threat of closure or where closure is under consideration and the number of beds each contains.

Mr. Whitney: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information he seeks. Information is not collected centrally about changes and improvements in services which might lead to closures, which are under consideration by health authorities.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all hospitals closed since May 1979 and the number of beds each contained.

Mr. Hayhoe: For the latest information available, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by my predecessor on 20 May 1985 at columns 317-29 and also to my reply to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) on 20 February at columns 309-10.

Details of the number of beds not shown in the two replies to which I have referred are as follows:

Number of beds in hospitals approved for complete closure 1 April 1985—30 June 1985

Region	District	Hospital	Number of Beds
Yorkshire	Leeds Eastern	Marguerite Hepton	47
	Leeds Western	Grassington	234

Correspondence

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he is going to answer the letters from the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central dated 25 November 1985 and 22 January 1986 asking him to conduct an inquiry into the dismissal of Mr. J. Brown from the social security appeal tribunals.

Mr. Major: I wrote to the right hon. Member on 7 January in reply to his letter of 25 November. I regret that we have no record of having received his letter of 22 January, but if he would like to write to me again I will see that his letter receives immediate attention.

Departmental Office, Barnsley

Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report, the staffing levels of his Department's offices in the Barnsley, East constituency over the years (a) 1981, (b) 1982, (c) 1983, (d) 1984 and (e) 1985 to date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: Following is the information for the staffing levels on 1 February for each year:

	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986
Barnsley (East) ILO	170	166	142	125	136	132·5
Goldthorpe NIO	33	30	25	20	17	18·0
Wath on Dearne AO	51	54	57	61	65	63·0

Abbreviations: ILO—Integrated Local Office: NIO—National Insurance Office; AO—Area Office (dealing with supplementary benefit only).

The staff reductions reflect falls in work load mainly due to changes in procedure on contributory benefits, such as the introduction of statutory sick pay.

Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much money has been paid in overtime payments in the local Department of Health and Social Security offices in the Barnsley, East constituency over the years 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985 to date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: Records on overtime are available only from 27 October 1981. The annual cost in constant terms of overtime worked in social security local offices in the Barnsley, East constituency for the period 27 October 1981 to 16 January 1982 and subsequent years is as follows:

	October 1981 to January 1982	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86
	£	£	£	£	£
Barnsley (East) ILO	7,710	34,296	12,097	87,468	64,471
Goldthorpe NIO	0	0	0	14,091	16,085
Wath on Dearne AO	2,792	23,396	6,912	54,501	31,504

Abbreviations: ILO—Integrated Local Office; NIO—National Insurance Office; AO—Area Office (dealing with supplementary benefit only).

These figures are based on 1984-85 average costs of overtime in the Department.

The increase in overtime from 1984-85 was due to the miners' strike and the industrial dispute at Newcastle central office.

Drug RU 486

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) pursuant to the answer of 26 February, what is the nature of the two clinical trials being conducted on the use of the drug RU 486;

(2) pursuant to the answer of 26 February, when he expects the clinical trials involving RU 486 to be completed;

(3) pursuant to the answer of 26 February, whether he will state what quality of RU 486 is being used during the course of the current clinical trials that are taking place.

Mr. Hayhoe: All information provided to the licensing authority in support of applications made or exemptions applied for under the Medicines Act 1968 is treated as confidential under that Act.

The quality of all drugs undergoing clinical trials is always carefully considered prior to the licensing authority indicating that it has no objection to the trials proceeding.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) pursuant to the answer of 26 February, what steps he intends to take to ensure that the clinical trials involving RU 486, are conducted in compliance with the requirements of the Abortion Act;

(2) whether he will carry out inquiries as to the use of the drug RU 486 in the procuring of an abortion;

(3) whether he has received information as to the use of the drug RU 486 in the procuring of abortion;

(4) what is his policy on the prosecution of those who procure abortion other than under the terms of the Abortion Act 1967.

Mr. Hayhoe: This drug has been approved for use in abortion only in the clinical trial to which I referred in my reply to the hon. Member on 26 February at column 606. The trial is still continuing, and the doctor responsible has given an undertaking that the requirements of the Abortion Act will be met. Any alleged breaches of the Act are investigated and, where appropriate, referred to the police or prosecution authorities.

Hypothermia

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, for the United Kingdom, and for England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland separately, the number of deaths with any mention of hypothermia on the death certificate for the year 1985; and if he will break down the figures by (a) month of the year and (b) by age groups (i) under 25, (ii) 25 to 34, (iii) 35 to 44, (iv) 45 to 54, (v) 55 to 64, (vi) 65 to 74, (vii) 75 to 84 and (viii) 85 years and over.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

North-West Thames Regional Health Authority (Sales)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State Social Services if the sums received by the North-West Thames regional health authority from the sale of Leamington park hospital and the land of Neasden hospital will be allocated in their entirety to the Brent district health authority in addition to the allocation already announced for 1986-87; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that this information is not available centrally. Regional health authorities are responsible for land disposals. They operate within central guidance that the proceeds of sale should normally accrue to the district concerned.

State Retirement Pension

Sir Frederic Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the cost of all men aged over 60 years and presently in work retiring and receiving a retirement pension.

Mr. Newton: The latest available estimate of the likely net cost to public funds is about £2,600 million, based on 1983-84 benefit rates. I hope shortly to be able to produce costs based on 1985-86 benefit rates.

NHS Expenditure

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the percentage cumulative growth of National Health Service expenditure each year since 1979 (a) in retail prices index terms, (b) in terms of National Health Service pay and prices and (c) after taking account of the annually growing demand for health services; if he will give actual expenditure figures each year both in current and constant price terms in accordance with each of these three criteria; and if he will state the level of planned expenditure savings each year, both in current and constant price terms, together with the evidence on which these expenditure savings claims are based.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 19 February 1986, c. 205-7]: I regret that my earlier reply contained an error.

In the table headed "Health and Community Health Services Cost Improvements £Million"; line 4 (1984-85), all columns should read "105" and not "107".

Health Authorities (Efficiency Savings)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out the efficiency savings in expenditure achieved by each district health authority for each year since 1979.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 14 February 1986, c. 596]: I regret that my earlier reply contained an error.

In line 13 of the table provided (ie the figures relating to Mersey region); column 4 (1984-85) should read 6·0 and 7·6. The total of column 4 (1984-85) should therefore read 105·2 and not 106·8.

Maternity Units

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the number of live births in each maternity unit in 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively, indicating which of those units are located in teaching hospitals.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1986, c. 218]: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member all the information she seeks. Information for 1985 is not yet available centrally. A table giving the available information has been placed in the Library.

Health Authorities (Departmental Advice)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the difference in status and authority between a departmental circular to health authorities and advice such as that offered in December 1985.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 10 February 1986, c. 367]: In so far as both circulars and letters can be used to convey advice on or amplification of policies already promulgated on his behalf, the Secretary of State would expect both to carry similar weight in influencing action by health authorities. Letters are a more personal and informal means of communication and, as such, would remain subject to the Secretary of State's discretion as to whether, in any individual case, they may be released more widely.

Hospitals

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report for the years 1983, 1984 and 1985 (a) the number of hospitals with maternity and gynaecological services without a special care baby unit and (b) the number of hospitals with maternity and gynaecological services without paediatric cover.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 10 February 1986, c. 370]: The available information is given in the table. Information for 1985 if not yet available.

Hospitals with maternity and gynaecology departments:

Social Security Reform

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he will publish tables comparable to tables P5 and P6 of the technical annex to "Reform of Social Security", showing pension projections for widows on the assumption that their husbands die at the age of 60 years;

(2) whether he will publish tables similar to tables P5 and P6 of the technical annex to the White Paper, "Reform of Social Security", Cmnd. 9691, but assuming that the husband died at the age of 64 years.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his replies, 13 February 1986, c. 525-26 and 17 February 1986, c. 69-70]: The information requested is given in the tables. Tables P5B and P5C correspond to table P5 of the technical annex to the White Paper, and tables P6B and P6C correspond to table P6. The rates of personal pensions and occupational money purchase pensions in the tables are higher than those in the corresponding tables in the technical annex. This is because the figures in the technical annex are based on the assumption that the husband takes his pension at age 65 and that the widow's pension from his scheme is worth half of his pension. But the figures in the tables following assume that the husband dies before drawing his pension from the scheme and that the widow's pension is equivalent in value to a pension or annuity resulting from the total sum accumulated in his individual pension savings account.

DEFENCE

RAF Personnel

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence, further to the answers of 21 November and 13 January, whether a decision has been made yet on the future of SAC Alan Lightowler, SAC Wayne Kirehn, SAC Gwynfor Owen and SAC Geoffrey Jones.

Mr. Lee: Senior Aircraftman Lightowler has applied for and been granted premature voluntary release from the Royal Air Force with effect from 1 April 1986. No decision on the future of the remaining three airmen has yet been taken.

ROF, Radway Green

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is satisfied that the royal ordnance factory, Radway Green has the ability to supply ammunition; and whether he intends to place any orders at Radway Green before 31 March.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The royal ordnance factory at Radway Green has a proven ability to supply ammunition. One order for 7·62 mm ammunition has been placed for the financial year starting 1 April 1986, and others are under consideration. A substantial contract for the 1986-87 requirement for 5·56 mm ammunition was offered to Radway Green in October last but has not been accepted. Alternative proposals have since been received from the company and detailed supporting information is still expected from it.

Plastic Bullets

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether plastic bullets or practice rounds were purchased from the firm Hirtenberger Patronen in the years 1982-83 and 1983-84.

Mr. Norman Lamont: No.

Ammunition Purchases

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the dates in 1983-84 and 1984-85 on which contracts for 5·56 ball, tracer, and blank ammunition with the firms Dynamit Nobel, Hirtenberger Patronen, and Fabrique Nationale were signed; and if he will list the dates in 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 on which contracts for 9 mm ball and blank and 7·62 mm ball and tracer ammunition were signed with the firms Dynamit Nobel, Raufoss and Metallwerk Elisenhutte.

Mr. Norman Lamont: In the financial years specified, orders were placed on the listed companies for the relevant natures of small arms ammunition as follows:

Description	Company	Date placed
5·56 tracer	Fabrique Nationale	11 January 1985
9 mm ball	Dynamit Nobel	4 February 1985
7·62 tracer	Raufoss	19 July 1984
7·62 ball	Raufoss	5 October 1984

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is satisfied that there is no element of dumping in the prices quoted by the nationally-owned firms Hirtenberger Patronen and the Fabrique Nationale for the supply of ammunition to Her Majesty's Government; and whether he will investigate the state subsidies involved.

Mr. Norman Lamont: There is no evidence that prices quoted by Hirtenberger Patronen and Fabrique Nationale for the supply of ammunition to Her Majesty's Government have been artificially low. The basis of such quotations is a matter for the companies concerned.

RAF Upper Heyford

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, following recent representations, he is prepared to extend the noise insulation scheme at RAF Upper Heyford to include the village of Fritwell; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: No. Noise levels in the village of Fritwell are below the limit for inclusion in the scheme. However, the boundary of the scheme will be kept under review if noise levels change.

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Defence by what percentage the noise level in the village of Fritwell was outside the limit whereby it would have been entitled to a noise insulation grant following the recent tests at RAF Upper Heyford.

Mr. Lee: Average noise levels in the village of Fritwell are estimated to be no higher than 65dB(A) following the noise survey undertaken in 1985 in the vicinity of RAF Upper Heyford.

The qualifying level for inclusion in the Ministry's noise insulation grant scheme is an average of 70dB(A).

Civil Defence

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give a further breakdown of the item "local administration communications etc. in United Kingdom" under other support functions in table 2.3 in the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985", Vol. 2.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

Nuclear Explosions (Monitoring)

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the seismologists working for his Department at Blanknest are investigating the use of high frequency monitoring of nuclear explosions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The seismologists in my Department are investigating the use of high frequency seismic waves as part of their programme to develop methods and techniques to detect, locate and identify underground nuclear explosions.

Strategic Defence Initiative

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, pursuant to the answer of 24 February, Official Report, column 466, concerning strategic defence initiative research, he will elucidate the nature of the contractual arrangements which may render the contracts subject to United Kingdom or United States law; and if he will give examples of contractual terms in each case.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Contracts let by the United States Government or a United States company to a United Kingdom firm or university will be subject to United States law. Contracts let by Her Majesty's Government, flowing from an arrangement for specific research work with the United States Government, will be subject to United Kingdom law. Contractual terms will be consistent in each case with the respective national laws, where applicable, and with the inter-Governmental arrangements for United Kingdom participation in SDI research.

Helicopter Pilots

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the cost of training an Army helicopter pilot;

(2) what is the cost of training a Royal Air Force helicopter pilot.

Mr. Lee: I shall answer shortly.

Queen's Flight

Mr. Jim Spicer asked the Secretary of State for Defence what helicopters are currently in use with the Queen's Flight; and when they went into service.

Mr. Lee: Two Wessex helicopters are in service with The Queen's Flight. They entered service in June and July 1969.

RIMPAC Exercise

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make it his policy not to participate in future RIMPAC exercises.

Mr. Stanley: No.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence what benefits Her Majesty's Government expect the Royal Navy to gain from participation in the RIMPAC exercise.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 21 February, at columns 377.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will now withdraw United Kingdom forces from participation in RIMPAC 1986.

Mr. Stanley: No.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with representatives of foreign Governments about British participation in the RIMPAC exercises 1986.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend has had no such discussions.

Finance Office (Transfer)

Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has assessed the costs of the transfer of his Department's finance department including the contracts organisation from Leeds to Glasgow in the form of (a) loss of jobs, (b) transfer of office and (c) loss of efficiency, and so on.

Mr. Lee: I must ask the hon. Member to await the release of the formal consultative document on this proposal, which will be issued to all interested parties in the next few days.

Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received from people employed by his Department in the finance office in Leeds over the proposals to transfer the contracts organisation, and so on, from Leeds to Glasgow.

Mr. Lee: Although it is too early to forecast accurately the leval of representations, a number have already been received.

Ulster Defence Regiment

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the costs of the Ulster Defence Regiment, and its Reserve, divided between wages and salaries, other personnel costs, costs of construction and buildings, investment in military equipment and other costs for the fiscal year 1984-85.

Mr. Lee: Estimated costs for the financial year 1984-85 are in the following form:

	£ million
Wages and salaries	38·1
Support costs	3·5
Capital expenditure on equipment	0·5
Total	42·1

The figures for works costs are not readily available.

Royal Air Force (Clothing)

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are (a) the value and (b) the quantities of clothing for personnel in the Royal Air Force currently in store.

Mr. Lee: The value at replacement cost of clothing held in store by the RAF as at 1 October 1985 was £43·454 million. The number of different clothing items held was 5,682. Clothing is held in support of all RAF regular, reserve and cadet forces; in addition, the protective clothing held includes a range of flying clothing stocked to meet the requirements of all three services and the PE. Estimates of the quantities held of each item could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what special protection he proposes for nuclear dump sites in the event of (a) terrorist threats and (b) war.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have been asked to reply.

I assume that the hon. Member is referring to the potential sites announced by my right hon. Friend and NIREX on 25 February. Given the nature of the wastes concerned, no special precautions are likely to be needed beyond those currently envisaged for safe containment.

Service Personnel

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many service personnel submitted applications for discharge after six months had elapsed since enlistment and were turned down for any reason other than failure to follow the correct application procedure during 1983-84 and 1984-85;

(2) how many requests for discharge turned down due to failure to follow the correct procedure or submit correct documentation, were made prior and subsequent to the first six months of enlistment during 1983-84 and 1984-85;

(3) how many service personnel requested information regarding discharge during 1983-84 and 1984-85;

(4) how many personnel were detained at Colchester for offences which are not punishable under civilian law during 1983-84 and 1984-85;

(5) how many service personnel cases whose alleged offences were triable under civilian law were dealt with by any form of military hearing during 1983-84 and 1984-85;

(6) how many service personnel were charged with an offence during 1983-84 and 1984-85;

(7) how many service personnel were detained for periods exceeding 24 hours during investigations conducted by the Special Investigations Branch during 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 10 February 1986, c. 388]: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what record is kept of applications for discharge which are incorrectly submitted;

(2) what record is kept of requests for information both formal and informal, regarding discharge procedure and regulations.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 10 February 1986, c. 388]: No records are held centrally on these matters.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many investigations were conducted by the special investigations branch into cases of alleged homosexuality during 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 10 February 1986, c. 388]: The information requested on calendar year basis, is as follows:

	Royal Navy	Army	Royal Air Force
1983	25	52	44

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel requested discharge (a) on reaching the age of 18 years having enlisted below the age of 18 years and (b) before their contract was due to expire, but after six months from enlistment during 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 10 February 1986, c. 388]: Details of the numbers requesting discharge of reaching the age of 18 having enlisted below the age of 18 are not held centrally. The number of service men requesting discharge before expiry of their contract but after six months service from enlistment are as follows:

	Number

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel applied for and were granted a discharge within six months of enlistment during the years 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 10 February 1986, c. 388]: The number of service men who were discharged having exercised their right to claim discharge within six months of enlistment were as follows:

	Number
1983-84	3,655

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel requested that their contract of engagement be shortened during 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 10 February 1986, c. 388]: Young entrants (those aged less than 17 years and 6 months at enlistment) may shorten the terms of their regular engagement on or within 28 days of their 18th birthday. The numbers who exercised this option were:

	Number
1984-85	2,114

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service women were interviewed or interrogated my male investigating officers during the course of homosexual investigations during 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 10 February 1986, c. 388]: This information is not held centrally. All such interviews would, however, have been conducted in the presence of a female member of staff.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 4 March 1986

WALES

Trunk Roads

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those trunk roads major improvement schemes in Wales which have, during the past 10 years, appeared in the Welsh Office preparation pool, but which no longer are listed in this pool, and which have not yet been undertaken.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I have written to the hon. Gentleman today and placed a copy of my letter in the Library.

Sunday Trading

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received from bodies representing industry, local government, religious organisations, voluntary bodies or private individuals concerning the Government's proposals to abolish restrictions on Sunday trading in Wales; how many were in favour; and how many against.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply to his earlier question on this subject given by my right hon. Friend on 13 February, at column 508. Since then my right hon. Friend has received two more representations from religious organisations and five more from private individuals. All 83 representations received and both petitions opposed the Government's proposals. Records of representations sent to individual hon. Members are not kept by the Department.

MSC (School Courses)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much the Manpower Services Commission will be spending in 1986 on courses in schools in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I am advised by the MSC that, under the technical and vocational education initiative, it is estimated that £3·468 million will be available for the financial year 1986-87 for school and college-based TVEI projects in Wales.

National Garden Festival

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has decided upon a short list of sites for the 1992 National Garden Festival to be held in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have decided that the following four sites should be the subject of further detailed appraisal and planning prior to the final site selection.

Cardiff	—proposed by South Glamorgan County Council
Deeside	—proposed jointly by Alyn and Deeside District Council and Clwyd County Council
Ebbw Vale	—proposed by Blaenau Gwent Borough Council
Swansea (Llansamlet)	—proposed by Swansea City Council

I shall be engaging consultants to advise me and to work as appropriate with the local authorities in the next stage of this exercise.

CIVIL SERVICE

Unified Grading

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Minister for the Civil Service what progress has been made to extend unified grading in the Civil Service to principal level; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I am pleased to say that following the announcement made by my right hon. Friend the then Minister of State, Treasury on 26 July 1985, arrangements are now being made with effect from 1 January 1986 to bring a further 11,000 staff in a wide variety of grades at principal level into a new unified grade in the open structure. This change removes formal barriers between different occupational groups and classes at this level, making it easier for management to select people for jobs on the basis of merit alone irrespective of their background or method of entry into the service.

The necessary cost of assimilating staff to the new structure, including appropriate transitional arrangements, will be met from within Departments' planned running costs limits.

PRIME MINISTER

Bulphan

Q12. Mr. Proctor asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Bulphan.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

State School Education

Q38. Mr. Hardy asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the present condition of state school education throughout the United Kingdom.

The Prime Minister: While there have been marked improvements in both primary and secondary education, the Government believe that the standards now generally attained by our pupils are neither as good as they can be, or as good as they will need to be for the 21st century. The Government's education policies, such as those set out for England and Wales in the White paper "Better Schools" (Cmnd. 9469), aim at improving standards for all levels of ability and securing the best possible return from the national resources invested in our schools.

European Council

Q48. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister what issues she intends to raise at the next meeting of the European Council.

The Prime Minister: The next European Council is not due to be held until 26-27 June. It is not yet possible to say what issues will need to be discussed.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the preparations which have been made for the next meeting of the European Council.

The Prime Minister: The next European Council will be held on 26-27 June. It will be for the Dutch presidency to make the necessary arrangements.

Leith

Q65. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Prime Minister if she will make an official visit to Leith.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

USA (President)

Q80. Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister when she next expects to meet the President of the United States of America.

The Prime Minister: I hope to meet President Reagan when we both attend the economic summit in Tokyo early in May.

Peterhead

Q82. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Peterhead.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Research and Development

Q99. Mr. Madel asked the Prime Minister what discussions she has initiated in the light of the Cabinet Office's annual review of Government-funded research and development about the level of total Government spending on research and development; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Ministers have discussed the findings of the 1985 annual review and are continuing to consider the issues raised.

Wales

Q112. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister, when she next plans to visit Wales.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

European Community (Food Sales)

Q113. Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister whether she will initiate early measures at the Council of Ministers of the European Community to withdraw from the Commission the discretion given it to dispose of agricultural products to the Soviet Union at very low prices.

The Prime Minister: So long as there are substantial surpluses of agricultural produce in the Community one of the most economic ways of disposing of them is by sales to third countries. These take place at prices which reflect the competition on world markets. It would increase the cost of disposal to limit sales to particular markets. In the medium term the best way to reduce the need for sales of agricultural surpluses is to reduce production. A more realistic prices policy under the CAP would reduce the incentive to over-produce, would encourage greater consumption within the Community and put the CAP onto a more stable financial foundation. This remains a central element of our approach to improving the operation of the CAP.

Countryside (Preservation)

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Prime Minister if she will appoint a Minister to have special responsibility for co-ordination between the Department of the Environment and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food of Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the preservation of prime agricultural land and other attractive countryside sites; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No. I am satisfied that the present arrangements for co-ordination work well.

Planning Decisions

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the current arrangements for co-ordination between the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Department of the Environment in the consideration of planning decisions affecting agricultural land or country areas of environmental amenity.

The Prime Minister: Individual applications are, in the first instance, for individual local authorities to deal with, but there are well-established arrangements whereby local authorities consult MAFF, as well as many other bodies, in drawing up their development plans. There are also statutory requirements for consulting MAFF on applications for non-agricultural development on agricultural land.

If the application is called in there is a full opportunity for MAFF's case to be heard at a public inquiry, although the general policy is not to call in cases unless they raise planning issues of more than local importance.

Engagements

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 March.

Mr. Marlow asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 March.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 March.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 4 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Ammunition Factory, Radway Green

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Prime Minister if she will make an official visit to the royal ordnance small arms ammunition factory at Radway green, Cheshire.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

ENVIRONMENT

Urban Housing Renewal

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 30 January, Official Report, column 605, why Portsmouth was not listed among those authorities which have been sent copies of the list compiled by his Department's urban housing renewal unit of developers interested in refurbishing local authority housing estates for sale; and whether any other local authorities have been sent copies of this list who have not specifically requested copies of it.

Sir George Young: Portsmouth is one of four authorities which were inadvertently omitted from my answer of 30 January. The others are Cleethorpes, High Peak and Woking. They were sent the list because of their expressed interest in the possibility of private sector involvement in the redevelopment of estates, rather than in response to a specific request. Since 30 January, Dudley, Hillingdon, Preston and Sevenoaks have also been sent the list, at their request.

Big Ben

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the chimes from the Big Ben Clock Tower will be restored to proper working order; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 28 February 1986, c. 735]: There is nothing technically wrong with the chimes. Examination has revealed that a rubber bush, which absorbs the strike of the hammer on the largest quarter bell, has gradually become frozen hard over the current extended period of severe weather and has lost its usual resilience. The effect of this is to curtail the sound of the last strike. The expected onset of warmer weather will return the chimes to their former familiar sound.

This problem has not occurred since the harsh winter of 1947.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Doctors

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of vacancies for full-time doctors within prisons in the United Kingdom; what action he is taking to fill such posts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: There are eight vacancies for full-time medical officers of all grades in prisons in England and Wales and arrangements are being made to fill them by internal promotion and open competition.

Policemen (Statistics)

Sir Nicholas Bonsor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers were dismissed, reduced in rank, or fined in the last full year for which figures are exist.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information for 1984 is as follows:

	Number
Dismissed or required to resign	*115
Reduction in rank	26
Reduction in pay	35
Fine	292

* Of the 115 officers dismissed or required to resign, 57 had been found guilty of criminal conduct. The information is published in the annual reports of the Her Majesty's Chief Inpector of Constabulary and the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Rape Crisis Centres

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue guidelines on liaison between rape crisis centres and police forces outside the Metropolitan area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: As my right hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State stated in his reply to a question from the hon. Member on 23 January at column 270, we are considering with the police the scope for action on the issues raised by the recent report by the Women's National Commission on Violence Against Women. This will include the question of liaison between the police and victim support organisations.

School Attendance

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many parents have been (a) prosecuted and (b) convicted for failure to ensure their child's school attendance in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Mellor: The available information, which may be incomplete, relates to defendants proceeded against for offences against the Education Act 1944 and is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales"—offence classification 112 of table S1.S (A) of volume 1 of the supplementary tables for 1984. This information does not distinguish offences of failure to secure regular school attendance from other offences under this Act; nor is it possible to distinguish defendants who are parents from those who are guardians.

Airport Security

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, pursuant to the letter from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport to the hon. Member for Stretford of 5 February concerning airport security, he will explain the exceptional nature of the overt carriage of sub-machine guns by Metropolitan police officers at Heathrow from 9 January.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. Friend's agreement to the overt carriage of sub-machine guns by police officers at Heathrow was exceptional in the sense that such weapons had not previously been deployed for such purposes; and the authority related solely to Heathrow and is being kept under review. The weapons now deployed are capable of firing only in the single shot mode.

National Association of Victims Support Schemes

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any proposals to provide extra funds to the National Association of Victims Support Schemes to make up the shortfall in the association's funding for 1986-87 as a result of the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan counties; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The National Association of Victims Support Schemes receives no funding from the GLC or the metropolitan counties. I understand, however, that a number of local victims support schemes receive financial assistance from such authorities. The Government have ensured that successor authorities will have access in 1986-87 to all the resources that the GLC and the metropolitan counties would have received. Additional arrangements for voluntary bodies include powers for local authorities collectively to make grants, and transitional grant support from central Government on projects to the value of £20 million a year.

On the general question of funding for victims support schemes and their National Association, I refer the hon. and learned Member to the answer given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) on 14 January at column 545.

Firearms

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions (a) handguns, (b) shotguns have been discharged at (i) the police and (ii) third parties in each year since 1979, showing on how many occasions a police officer or third person was (a) injured and (b) killed, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 19 February 1986, c. 177]: The available information is given in the table.

TRANSPORT

River Wandle (Plough Lane Bridge)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Transport why he has turned down an application for special funding for the reconstruction of the Plough Lane bridge over the river Wandle; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I will write to the hon. Member about this case as soon as I can.

Disabled Drivers (Orange Badge Scheme)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he proposes to change the conditions of the orange badge scheme for disabled drivers when it expires shortly.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This valuable scheme for disabled people is not due to expire. Its current conditions were brought in with parliamentary approval during 1983 to tackle some damaging abuses that had crept in. We are about to review with local authorities and others concerned how the scheme has been working since then.

Highways

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will provide resources to local authorities to enable them to introduce new methods to co-ordinate work on public highways by public utilities;

(2) what plans he has to implement the recommendations of the Horne committee report on the Public Utilities Street Works Act 1950;

(3) if he will seek to give further powers to local authorities to control the quality of reinstatement of public highways by public utilities after they have dug them up.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Horne committee's report was published in November last year and comments invited by the end of next month. Before decisions can be taken we will need to consider the report in the light of these comments, not all of which have yet been received. We must consider carefully the proposals made for strengthening control over the quality of reinstatements. We will also consider the resource implications for local authorities of introducing new methods to co-ordinate works on highways, but I cannot undertake that special aid will be provided for this purpose.

Roads (Reinstatement)

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied with the standard of reinstatement of roads after they have been dug up by public utilities.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Not entirely. This was one of the principal reasons for setting up the review of the Public Utilities Street Works Act 1950 chaired by Professor Horne. We are now considering the report of the review in the light of comments made on it.

Chemicals (Conveyance)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if phoscatim has been (a) approved as a dangerous substance that is permitted for conveyance by road and (b) classified for the purpose of assigning a hazard warning sign on transporting vehicles.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This substance is a solid organophosphorus pesticide. It is listed by the World Health Organisation as "obsolete or discontinued". It would be regarded as "toxic" for transport purposes and vehicles carrying it in solution in tanks would have to display the appropriate hazard warning panel.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if chlorfenethol has been (a) approved as a dangerous substance that is permitted for conveyance by road and (b) classified for the purpose of assigning a hazard warning sign on transporting vehicles.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This substance is a solid organochlorine pesticide. It is regarded as "harmful" for the purposes of supply and use under the Classification, Packaging and Labelling Regulations 1984 and packages must be marked with a number of appropriate risk and safety phrases. The substance falls below the less stringent toxicity level for transport purposes and vehicles carrying it in solution in tanks would not be required to display hazard warning panels.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Peter Rees asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he proposes to include provision in the forthcoming Channel tunnel Bill for the A20 Folkestone-Dover road scheme.

Mr. David Mitchell: We intend to make provision in the Bill for the western part of the scheme from the end of the M20, to which the tunnel terminal will be linked, to Court wood on the existing A20. This new road will provide much needed early relief for Folkestone and Capel le Ferne from the traffic between east Kent and the tunnel. The remainder of the scheme from Court wood to Dover will be taken forward as quickly as possible under the normal Highways Act procedures.

Public Transport, Merseyside

Sir Ian Percival asked the Secretary of State for Transport what maximum limit of expenditure by the Merseyside passenger transport authority he has fixed for 1986-87; what are his plans and intentions as to expenditure by that authority in the two years following; and what are the likely implications for the ratepayers of Sefton having regard to the resulting precepts.

Mr. Ridley: Under the Precept Limitation (Passenger Transport Authorities) (Prescribed Maximum) Order 1986 the maximum precept which may be levied by the Merseyside passenger transport authority on Merseyside districts, including Sefton, in 1986-87 is 44·88p. It could, of course levy less. This figure was based upon an expenditure level redetermined on 20 December 1985 at £81·3 million, although the authority applied for substantially more at £105 million. I have made it clear that in the following two years of precept control further substantial reductions in revenue support must be achieved in order to ensure a reasonable balance between the needs of transport users and of taxpayers.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Warship Yards

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make it his policy to ensure that Barrow and Birkenhead shipyards cannot pass out of United Kingdom ownership, following their privatisation; and if he plans to include provisions for a golden share.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We will ensure Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd. remains in United Kingdom ownership following its sale by British Shipbuilders. Any necessary arrangements will be in place before the business is sold.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is prepared to urge the introduction of a social clause into the multi-fibre arrangement bilateral agreements so as to ensure that the textile and clothing products imported into the United Kingdom are produced by workers who enjoy the protection of the minimum terms and conditions of employment laid down by the International Labour Organisation.

Mr. Alan Clark: I see no need to strengthen the existing references to social development in the mulit-fibre arrangement.

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the decisions reached on the Community's multi-fibre arrangement negotiating mandate at the February meeting of the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Council of Ministers reached decisions on some aspects of negotiating mandate but will not finalise its position until the Council on 10-11 March. The House will understand that the Community cannot announce its detailed negotiating objectives.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many officials in his Department have been seconded from industry; and how many were in place on (a) 1 January 1980, (b) 1 January 1981, (c) 1 January 1982, (d) 1 January 1983, (e) 1 January 1984, (f) 1 January 1985 and (g) 1 January 1986.

Mr. Pattie: The number of officials in the Department of Trade and Industry and its predecessor Departments who have been seconded from industry and commerce between 1 January 1980 and 1 January 1986 is 102.

The number in place on 1 January in each of the years concerned was:

	Number
1980	24
1981	15
1982	17
1983	21
1984	25
1986	33

ENERGY

Oil (Production and Prices)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will discuss world oil production and prices with the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My right hon. Friend maintains frequent contacts with representatives of other oil-producing countries, including members of OPEC.

Chapel Cross and Calder Hall

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) whether the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate had sight of all relevant reports and accompanying correspondence from Mr. Peter Phelan before signing off the long-term safety reviews for Chapel Cross and Calder Hall power stations; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what steps the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate has taken to satisfy itself of the capacity of Chapel Cross and Calder Hall nuclear power stations to withstand seismological shocks; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will specify the magnitude of seismic events expected to occur at least once in a nominal 40-year operating life at Chapel Cross and Calder Hall plants;

(4) if he will specify the most severe seismic event expected to occur at Chapel Cross or Calder Hall in a nominal 40-year operating life;

(5) if he will specify the maximum magnitude of seismic events which, in the light of recent research studies, could be expected to permit the nuclear reactors at Chapel Cross and Calder Hall to survive, be safely shut down and subsequently be maintained in safe condition.

Mr. Goodlad: The Nuclear Installations Inspectorate is already checking to see whether there is anything new in the reported allegations of Mr. Phelan, and I hope to be able to reply to the hon. Member's questions shortly.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Rape and Murder Charges

Mr. Corbett asked the Attorney-General if he will publish in the Official Report those cases, by title and trial result date since the passing of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976, in which rape and murder charges have been tried in one trial, giving the number of defendants on each charge at each trial and specifying in which trials judges have (a) been requested to make and (b) have made directions under section 6(2)(a) of that Act.

The Attorney-General: The information sought by the hon. Member is not centrally recorded. It could be obtained only at disproportionate cost to the taxpayer.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Overseas Development Administration

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the staff of the Overseas Development Administration by grade showing in each case the number of males and females, respectively.

Mr. Raison: The total number of staff of the Overseas Development Administration on 1 February 1986 was 1,528. Of these, 599½ (including part-time staff) were female. Details are:

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many of the consultants used by the Overseas Development Administration in each of the past three years have been male and female, respectively.

Mr. Raison: The ODA employs firms, not individuals, to carry out consultancy contracts. We have no record of the number of male and female staff employed by firms for doing this work.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what are the responsibilities and duties of the Duchy of Lancaster Office; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tebbit: The Duchy of Lancaster Office administers, under my supervision, the Queen's estates in the right of Her Duchy of Lancaster; and other palatinate responsibilities which fall to me, such as the appointment of high sheriffs and of magistrates within the counties of Lancashire, Greater Manchester and Merseyside; and the administration of intestate estates within the county palatine. In addition, there are a small number of historical appointments to church livings and the governing bodies of schools and universities.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Mr. Chapman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will report progress on his consultations with the Countryside Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council over the selection and setting up of environmentally sensitive areas proposed under the Agriculture Bill.

Mr. Jopling: My officials are in close touch with the Countryside Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council, which are now carrying out a detailed analysis of the short-listed areas in England and Wales in consultation with the various organisations concerned. They expect to complete this work around Easter and will be making recommendations to me and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales by the end of April.

EC (Agricultural Expenditure)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what is the total amount of agricultural spending by the EEC which is permitted in terms of the strict budgetary controls agreed at the European Council; and what estimate has been made by the Commission of the likely expenditure in 1986 if its farm prices and other agricultural measures are agreed;

(2) what steps he is taking to inform hon. Members of the detailed proposals in the 1986 farm price review of the EEC before the debate on the subject which is to take place on Monday 10 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Outgoers Scheme

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate the Commission has made of the increased production of other commodities if its proposals for a new outgoers scheme for dairy farmers is implemented.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Intervention Stores

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total amount of various perishable foodstuffs and fish, respectively, which were withdrawn from the market by the Intervention Board in 1985; and what part of each of these totals was destroyed.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Helsinki Final Act

Mr. Knowles asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in the implementation by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and eastern European countries of the provisions of the Helsinki final act during the last six months.

Mr. Renton: Implementation by the Soviet Union and eastern European countries of their commitments under the Helsinki final act over the six-month period to 31 December 1985 has continued to be generally unsatisfactory. Levels of compliance have reflected the Warsaw Pact countries' selective interpretation of their commitments. There have again been widespread breaches of the provisions relating to human rights and fundamental freedoms though with variations in the pattern of implementation as between individual states.

SECURITY IN EUROPE: PRINCIPLES GUIDING RELATIONS BETWEEN PARTICIPATING STATE; CONFIDENCE-BUILDING MEASURES AND CERTAIN ASPECTS OF SECURITY AND DISARMAMENT (BASKET I).

The most notable feature of Eastern performance over the period was the continued non-compliance with principle VII which relates to "respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief."

This was particularly evident in the Soviet Union where official harassment of religious groups, dissidents and ethnic minorities continued unabated, and in some instances appeared to have been stepped up. Soviet practice offered no evidence of any impending change in policy in any area of human rights.

The Jewish community continued to face difficulties, not only on the question of emigration, but also in practising its religion and in following its cultural traditions. Confiscation of religious material from the homes of Soviet Jews, particularly of refuseniks, was widespread and the pressures on the teaching of Hebrew maintained. In August, Roald Zelichenok, a private Hebrew teacher was sentenced to three years' labour camp for "defaming the Soviet state"; in October, Leonid Volvovsky was also imprisoned on the same charge. A number of other Jews, whose only offence appears to be to have taught Hebrew unofficially, continued to serve sentences throughout the period under review.

Members of Christian groups were also subjected to harassment and persecution where they have declined to register with the authorities or generally to work within the rigid laws governing religious activity in the Soviet Union. Although freedom of religion or belief is enshrined not only in the final act but also in the Soviet constitution, in practice churches must operate under official supervision. Arrests and imprisonment of believers of various sects were once again reported throughout the period. Vasiliy Boechko, an unregistered Pentecostalist bishop was arrested around the beginning of September and is still awaiting trial. Groups such as Jehovah's Witnesses and the Uniate Catholic Church remained proscribed organisations. In August, Iosip Terelya, a member of the unofficial committee to defend the Ukrainian Catholic church (the Uniates) was senteced to seven years in a labour camp plus five years of internal exile. He had spent many years previously in camps and psychiatric hospitals. In October another underground Baptist printing press was discovered, this time in Moldavia. Six arrests followed. In July, a group of Hare Krishna followers in the Stavropol territory were sentenced to up to five years in the camps; others in different parts of the Soviet Union were harassed or arrested. In Central Asia and Azerbaidzhan, Moslems have been subjected to continuing atheist propaganda. The authorities have expressed alarm at local indications of increased devotion to Islam. Relatively few officialy registered mosques are open.

The "Group to establish Trust between the USSR and US" was particularly affected by a crackdown on dissent before and after during the Moscow youth festival in July-August. Dr. Vladimir Brodsky, a leading member of the group was arrested in July and subsequently sentenced to three years imprisonment on a charge of "malicious hooliganism".

There was similarly no significant improvement in the position of the better known individual cases although the release of Mrs. Yelena Bonner to the West for medical treatment towards the end of the reporting period was a welcome development. Dr. Sakharov, however, remained in internal exile in Gorky. There was speculation that the psychiatrist Anatoly Koryagin might be close to death in Chistopol prison where he had been held since 1982. Recent news confirmed that he had been moved in July 1985 to a labour camp and is still critically ill in the camp hospital. There was renewed evidence of the continuing abuse of psychiatry in suppressing dissent, a practice which Dr. Koryagin helped to expose.

The unsatisfactory attitude of the Bulgarian authorities towards their CSCE commitments remained substantially unchanged. Once more, emphasis was put on principles I (sovereignty) and VI (non-interference in internal affairs) while commitments under principle VII were virtually ignored. Bulgarian treatment of the ethnic Turkish minority, and denial of its existence, continued to give cause for very considerable concern. The Bulgarian authorities continue to try to establish control over religious communities by direct interference and force. The Government control where their citizens work and live and although the constitution guarantees freedom of speech and association, these cannot be exercised "to the detriment of the public interest".

In Czechoslovakia, the repressive attitude to human rights was maintained. Routine harassment of both dissidents and religious activists continued. Freedom of expression and other civil liberties remain severely restricted. There is continued pressure on human rights' groups such as Charter 77 and the Jazz Section. In two recent trials, friends of the accused and Western diplomats were denied entrance to the courtroom.

East German implementation of its CSCE commitments under the final act was varied. Restrictions on human rights and individual freedoms remained a central problem. There was little or no relaxation in the restrictions on freedom of movement. However, the GDR attitude towards the church remained more accommodating than in some other countries. Contacts with overseas churches were permitted without state interference.

Hungarian observance of CSCE principles during the six months remained generally good, though some retrograde steps were noted. Among the latter was the revision of an existing decree which widened the scope for police surveillance and deportation. During the CSCE Cultural Forum in Budapest, attended by delegates from eastern and western Europe, the Hungarian authorities decided to ban unauthorised public meetings discussing cultural freedom and related matters. Meetings, however, took place unhindered in private.

Religious freedom in Poland remained greater than in other eastern European countries, although criticism of the Church by the authorities increased, and harassment of priests associated with the opposition continued. The repression of dissent showed a tendency to increase. The growing use of a summary court procedure in cases against opposition activists gave cause for concern. The number of political prisoners rose to over 400 in the autumn; after which about 220 minor offenders were released, on stringent conditions, as a humanitarian gesture. These did not include any of the leading Solidarity activists. In November it was announced that about 60 staff in universities and polytechnics were to be dismissed from their administrative positions under a procedure introduced by amendments adopted in 1985 to the Higher Education Law.

Romania remained one of the more oppressive countries in Eastern Europe as far as human rights and fundamental freedoms were concerned. Conditions for national minorities, particularly Hungarians, seem to have deteriorated further. The Department of Religious Affairs maintained tight control over the various religious denominations and continued to harass church leaders and believers who went beyond the narrow guidelines laid down for religious practice. In August, however, the authorities finally granted an exit visa to Orthodox priest, Father Calciu as well as to the dissident Dorin Tudoran.

CONFIDENCE AND SECURITY-BUILDING MEASURES

The GDR notified participants of an exercise held from 6 to 14 July involving both Soviet and Eastern German troops. No observers were, however, invited. Soviet Union notified one major military exercise, "Caucasus" which took place from 15 to 21 July and to which observers from some Western countries were invited. These were believed to be the only exercises requiring notification held by the Warsaw Pact countries during the period under review. Warsaw Pact countries declined the invitation to send observers to the exercise "Brave Defender" held in the United Kingdom; however Soviet and Czechoslovak observers attended the exercise "Trutzige Sachsen" held in September by the Federal Republic of Germany.

CO-OPERATION IN THE FIELD OF ECONOMICS, OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY AND OF THE ENVIRONMENT (BASKET II)

In general, the procedures for conducting business in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe have remained unchanged and the flow of economic and commercial information limited. However, in Poland and Hungary, increasing numbers of domestic producers have been allowed to negotiate foreign trade transactions directly, without the intervention of the Foreign Trade Organisations.

CO-OPERATION IN HUMANITARIAN AND OTHER FIELDS (BASKET III)

Eastern implementation of their commitments in this field remained generally unsatisfactory, particularly with regard to family reunification and contacts with individuals from states outside the Warsaw Pact. Emigration to the West has continued at a low level. In the Soviet Union the number of exit visa permits granted to ethnic Germans declined further; the number of Soviet Jews who emigrated during the review period was marginally higher than the figure for the preceding six months but the figures still fell a very long way short of the high levels of emigration observed a few years ago: (the 1985 figure was 1,140 compared with 908 in 1984). Long waiting lists remained despite Soviet claims that virtually all those Jews wishing to leave had already done so. There were successive rumours and denials from different quarters about a possible increase in the number of emigrants. In the GDR, the number of emigration visas granted increased over the period but still only a fraction of those wishing to leave the GDR have been allowed to do so. With very few exceptions restrictions remained in force in all Warsaw Pact countries on individuals wishing to visit the West, as well as in access to Western diplomatic missions. Compliance with the Helsinki and Madrid provisions on information by the Warsaw Pact countries remained poor with restrictions on access to overseas sources of information. Jamming of Western broadcasts continued especially by the Soviet Union, which, according to BBC estimates, currently spends upwards of £500 million per annum on jamming.

CO-OPERATION AND EXCHANGES IN THE FIELD OF CULTURE AND EDUCATION

Bureaucratic and economic constraints continued to limit the development of most bilateral programmes with Western countries, although there was agreement at the US-Soviet summit in November to broaden bilateral exchanges. The Budapest Cultural Forum of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE) failed to reach agreement on practical measures to improve cultural co-operation between East and West.

Gibraltar

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to seek to secure the listing of the Gibraltar defences in the world heritage list set up by the world heritage convention; what arrangements have been made with the Gibraltar Government to ensure their maintenance, repair and public display; what funds he makes available for these purposes; what steps he is taking to seek to enlist private contributions; what support is forthcoming from international agencies including the world heritage fund; if he will visit Gibraltar to inspect the conditions of the defences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The Gibraltar defences were put forward last year in the "tentative list" of sites for inclusion in the world heritage list. We have in hand work on the preparation of their case for their formal nomination to the list. When this has been completed, the Gibraltar defences will be among those sites to be considered for such nomination.

The Gibraltar defences are protected as ancient monuments under the Gibraltar Museum and Antiquities Ordinance 1982. Their maintenance, repair and public display are matters for the Gibraltar Government.

My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans at present to visit the Gibraltar defences.

Krasnoyarsk Radar System

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to encourage the evaluation of the Krasnoyarsk radar system by the joint United States — Soviet standing consultative committee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We have made it clear that the siting and orientation of the large phased array radar under construction at Krasnoyarsk gives rise to serious questions in connection with obligations under the ABM treaty. The United Kingdom is not, however, a party to the treaty and does not participate in the Standing Consultative Commission, whose proceedings are confidential.

New Zealand (Royal Visit)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government have made, or propose to make, any representations to the Government of New Zealand concerning the arrangements for the security of Her Majesty the Queen during her current visit to that country; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Her Majesty paid this visit as Queen of New Zealand. We were not involved in any way in the organisation of this visit, for which full responsibility, including that for security, lay with the New Zealand authorities.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Value Added Tax

Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current position on the difference of view between the European Community Commission and Her Majesty's Government regarding the zero rating of certain goods and services.

Mr. Brooke: The EC Commission has applied to the European Court of Justice for a declaration against the United Kingdom that the zero rating of certain goods and services is incompatible with the sixth VAT directive, as not being for clearly defined social reasons or for the benefit of the final consumer. The Government do not accept this contention and will defend the issue before the European Court. It is unlikely that the case will be heard, at the earliest, before the end of the year.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he will list for each country in the European Economic Community the percentage value added tax take-up entailed by the budget approved by the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total revenue generated by value added tax and duty on tobacco products in the last full year for which figures are available; and what proportion this represented of total value added tax receipts.

Mr. Brooke: The excise duties on tobacco products yielded some £4,340 million in the calendar year 1985. It is estimated that the related value added tax was of the order of £910 million. This total of £5·25 billion is equivalent to 26 per cent. of the total net receipts of value added tax in the same period.

Income Tax

Mr. Fallon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average amount of income tax paid at the standard rate in 1978-79 and 1984-85.

Mr. Moore: The average income tax liability per taxpayer, excluding liabilities at rates in excess of the basic rate and the investment income surcharge, was about £900 in 1978-79. The corresponding figure for 1984-85 was about £1,600. The estimate for 1978-79 takes account of tax collected at the lower rate of 25 per cent.

Taxation

Mr. Wigley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the latest number of people who are paying income tax at the top rate of 60 per cent. on earned income; and what are the total tax receipts obtained from these persons paying at the rate of 60 per cent.

Mr. Moore: About 90,000 married couples and single people will pay income tax for 1985-86 at the rate of 60 per cent. The total tax liability on that part of their income subject to the 60 per cent. rate is about £1·4 billion. If investment income is disregarded, the number liable to tax at 60 per cent. on part of their earned income is about 50,000, with a corresponding tax liability on that income of about £0·8 billion.

Excise Duty

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the revenue received from duties on spirits from the beginning of the current financial year to the month for which he has the latest figures together with the figures for the same period in the two immediately preceding years; and if he will give similar data for the complete years 1983-84 and 1984-85, and the expected figures for the financial year ending 31 March.

Mr. Brooke: The revenue received from duties on spirits for the first nine months of the current financial year and of the previous two financial years is as follows:

£ million

	Excise duty	VAT*	Total
April-December 1983	1,229	255	1,484
April-December 1984	926	280	1,206
April-December 1985	1,171	295	1,466

The revenue from duties on spirits for the last two complete financial years and the Budget estimate for the current year are as follows:

£ million

	Excise duty	VAT*	Total
1983-84	1,702	430	2,132
1984-85	1,242	455	1,697
1985-86 (estimate)	1,460	n.a.	n.a.

*Estimates based on consumers' expenditure data; forecasts of VAT receipts from particular goods are not made.

Women (Tax Returns)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many women who have submitted tax returns during the last seven years to Inland Revenue offices in England and Wales were registered as being over the age of 60 years and being engaged in (a) full-time or (b) part-time employment.

Mr. Moore: The Inland Revenue keeps no records of tax returns submitted by reference to the age of the taxpayer. I regret that the information is not, therefore, available.

EC (Agricultural Spending)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what level of European Economic Community agricultural expenditure was fixed for 1986 under the budgetary discipline arrangements; what is his current estimate of agricultural expenditure in 1986; what steps he will take to ensure that agricultural spending does not exceed the budgetary discipline limit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The Council of Ministers agreed last year on a financial guideline of 20,619 mecu for agricultural market support expenditure in 1986 for the Community of Ten. The EC budget for 1986 includes 20,445 mecu for such expenditure with an additional 567 mecu for expenditure in Spain and Portugal giving a total of 21,012 mecu for the whole Community. The EC Commission in its proposals for CAP prices for 1986-87 has indicated its intention of seeking 790 mecu supplementary provision for agriculture in 1986, mainly to take account of the effects of the significant fall in the value of the dollar against the ecu since the 1986 budget was drawn up. Both the Council of Ministers and the Commission have committed themselves under the budget discipline conclusions to make every effort to avoid the need to take supplementary provision for agriculture. It will be a key United Kingdom objective to ensure that the budget discipline conclusions are respected in the CAP price fixing negotiation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Welsh Business

Mr. Best asked the Lord Privy Seal, if he will state for each of the last six years the number of (a) Welsh debates, (b) meetings of the Welsh Grand Committee and (c) statements on matters relating to Wales; and if he will give similar information in respect of Scotland.

Mr. Biffen: In so far as debates and statements on Scottish and Welsh matters can be separately identified the information is as follows:

Session	*Debates		Statements relating to
	Welsh	Scottish	Wales	Scotland
1979-80	11	13	1	1
1980-81	3	20	2	4
1981-82	5	12	3	3
1982-83	4	8	2	2

* Excluding debates on various stages of legislation, ten minute rule bills, money resolutions, SO No. 10 applications and PNQs but including inter alia daily adjournment debates and debates on statutory instruments.

Information about meetings of the Scottish and Welsh Grand Committees and of other standing committees is contained in the Return of Standing Committees published sessionally as a House of Commons paper.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Student Grants

105. Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what have been the changes in the level of student grants, especially for those students from Northern Ireland, who are studying in Britain.

Dr. Mawhinney: The rates for mandatory awards, which were increased by around 3 per cent. for 1985-86, apply irrespective of whether students are studying within Northern Ireland or elsewhere within the United Kingdom. They are as follows:

£1,480 for students studying from their parental home;
£1,830 for students living away from home but outside London; and
£2,165 for students living away from home in London.

SCOTLAND

Electoral Areas

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many orders have been made under section 17 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 to amend electoral areas; and how many were for (a) regional councils, (b) district councils, (c) island councils and (d) a combination of regional or island and district councils, respectively.

Mr. John MacKay: Twenty-one orders have been made under section 17 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 to amend the electoral areas constituted following the initial review by the Local Government Boundary Commission for Scotland under schedule 5 of the Act of the electoral arrangements for regions, islands areas and districts throughout Scotland. Of these, three affect the electoral areas of regional councils, three affect the electoral areas of district councils, and 15 affect the electoral areas of both regional and district councils. None relate to islands area councils.

Salmon Poaching

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will give the average sentence meted out by courts for poaching salmon by means of poisoning the water in the last 12 months together with the previous three year's figures;

(2) if he will give the number of convictions obtained in the courts for poaching salmon by means of poisoning the water, in the last 12 months, together with the previous three years' figures;

(3) what was the average sentence meted out by courts for poaching salmon in the last 12 months, together with the previous three years' figures.

Mr. Rifkind: I regret that this information is not available.

Scottish Examination Board

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he proposes to take to require the Scottish Examination Board to review its syllabus for the higher grade examination in religious studies following the representations from various bodies about its apparent discrimination against candidates who are not of the Christian religion.

Mr. Allan Stewart: A number of representations were received by the Scottish Examination Board during the course of its normal consultations on the proposed new higher grade religious studies course about the fact that a candidate may concentrate wholly on Christianity if he or she wishes. These comments were considered and rejected by the board's religious studies panel. The new syllabus, like all other syllabuses of the Scottish Examination Board, will in any event be kept under review. I therefore see no reason to take any action.

Milk Quota

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will reallocate the remainder of the Scottish running reserve of wholesale milk quota.

Mr. Rifkind: I intend that an amended and consolidated version of the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations should come into operation in March. I am glad to say that this will enable most of the remainder of the Scottish running reserve of quota to be reallocated before the end of the 1985-86 milk year and will mean that producers' 1985-86 wholesale milk quota can be finalised.

In these reallocations we shall be helping a number of groups of producers. Firstly those whose development awards were reduced by 42·5 per cent. when the awards were made will have 10 per cent. of that cutback in quota restored to them.

Secondly in order to comply with Community requirements 1985-86 wholesale quota has to be 1 per cent. less than that for 1984-85, but small producers producing up to 200,000 litres per annum have had their quota maintained at the 1984-85 level. Similarly the whole of the 1 per cent. reduction for 1985-86 will be restored to islands producers and those in Kintyre, south of Tarbert.

Thirdly in view of the disproportionate amount of quota which came out of the areas of the Aberdeen and district milk marketing board and the North of Scotland milk marketing board as a result of the milk outgoers' scheme, I am restoring to producers there sufficient quota from the reserve to ensure that there has been no net loss of quota from these areas.

The fourth group of producers we shall be helping includes those whose land has been expropriated and either has been or will be restored to them, and who will have returned to dairying by 31 March 1989. The balance of the reserves available at the beginning of the 1986-87 milk year will be used for this purpose.

Since the reduction of 1 per cent. mentioned above can only be made on issued quota, it will be necessary to increase the 1985-86 cutback to 1·05 per cent. of the 1984-85 quota for mainland wholesale producers who have farming as their main occupation (with the exception of small producers). This will, however, be partly offset by a restoration of 0·4624 per cent. from the reserves, giving a net reduction in quota of 0·5876 per cent.

EMPLOYMENT

Radiation

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Paymaster General what changes were introduced into the methods of (a) assessing and (b) recording exposure of workers to radiation under the regulations which came into force on 1 January; whether, under the new regulations, there are any circumstances in which the dose record of a worker exposed to radiation either internally or externally will show a lower level of recorded exposure than previously would have been recorded for the same exposure; and if he will make a statement on the implications of the revised regulations for the interpretation of the cumulative dose records of workers exposed to radiation both before and after 1 January.

Mr. Trippier: The following changes in assessing and recording exposures of workers were introduced by the Ionising Radiations Regulations 1985 (a) any committed dose received from internal radiation must now be assessed, as well as any actual dose from external radiation, and (b) the dose record must show the sum total of committed and actual dose received. There are no circumstances in which a lower level of dose will be recorded under the new regulations than would have been recorded under the previous regulations. There is no requirement in the new regulations for a record of cumulative dose.

Community Programme

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Paymaster General (1) how he proposes to seek to overcome trade union resistance to community programme schemes;

(2) whether he will remove the need to obtain trade union consent to community programme schemes as a precondition to obtaining Manpower Services Commission approval to such schemes.

Mr. Lang: The undoubted success of the community programme is due to the support of many organisations including employers and trade unions. Where local difficulties arise, efforts are made to seek local solutions and experience has shown that this is the best approach.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Paymaster General what proportion of the places available on the community programme are currently taken up by participants in (a) Wolverhampton, (b) Birmingham, (c) Coventry and (d) Walsall; and how many of the additional places will be distributed among participants in these towns.

Mr. Lang: At the end of January the proportion of available community programme places taken up by participants in these areas were:—

(a) 84·3 per cent. (3,380 filled places) in Wolverhampton/Walsall.
(b) 82·2 per cent. (6,591 filled places) in Birmingham/Solihull.
(c) 86·8 per cent. (3,080 filled places) in Warwickshire, including Coventry.

Between 1 February and the end of May the number of filled places in these areas is planned to increase by:

(a) 720 in Wolverhampton/Walsall.
(b) 1,009 in Birmingham/Solihull.
(c) 320 in Warwickshire, including Coventry.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Paymaster General if he will list the number of people who have been employed on a full-time basis on community programme projects in each year since 1982; and what this number represents as a percentage of the total number of participants in the community programme in each year during the same period.

Mr. Lang: The numbers and percentages of people employed on a full-time basis on community programme projects at the end of each year since 1982 are as follows:

		per cent.
1982	980	46·1
1983	39,200	34·1
1984	38,100	29·3
1985	48,400	26·5

School Leavers

Mr. Wainwright asked the Paymaster General how many 16-year-old 1985 school leavers are not taking advantage of a place on the YTS, and are currently registered as unemployed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: In January 1986 there were an estimated 100,000 young people in Great Britain included in the count of unemployed claimants who left school in 1985 aged 16. Most remain eligible to take advantage of the YTS: some were waiting to take up a YTS place allocated to them and others can be expected to participate later on. In addition, some members of the group will already have taken part in the YTS since leaving school.

Manufacturing Industry (Apprentices)

Mr. Wainwright asked the Paymaster General what is his Department's latest estimate of the number of full-time apprentices currently employed in British manufacturing industries; and what was the comparable number for the same period in 1979.

Mr. Trippier: There were 73,200 full-time apprentices employed in british manufacturing industries in March 1985. For 1979, the most comparable figure is 155,000.

The numbers entering traditional apprenticeships will become increasingly irrelevant as a measure of the real level of skills training being undertaken by industry because of both the modernisation of existing training arrangements and the substantial provision of initial skills training now taking place under YTS.

Public Sector Employees

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General if he will compare the total number of persons employed in the entire public sector (a) in actual and (b) in full-time equivalent terms, where appropriate, for each of the years 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively; and if he will show these figures as a percentage of the total employed work force in each year.

Mr. Lang: I refer my hon. Friend to an article "Employment in the public and private sectors 1979 to 1985" on pages 90-98 of Economic Trends December 1985, a copy of which is in the Library. The entire public sector employment figures, actual and full-time equivalents, are given in table 1 of appendix 1 for the years 1979 to 1985. The employed labour force figure for 1979 is in table A and the corresponding figures for the years 1980 to 1985 are in table 2 of appendix 1.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General (1) if he will list the number of persons made redundant who were included in the unemployment count for each of the years 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985 and at the latest available date for which figures are available; and if he will show this figure as a percentage of the total unemployed for each year;

(2) if he will list the numbers of disabled included in the unemployment count for each of the years 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985; and if he will show this as a percentage of total unemployment in each year.

Mr. Lang: I refer my hon. Friend to the replies given to him on 27 November 1985 at columns 596-7.

Mr. Wainwright asked the Paymaster General how many people aged (a) under 19 years and (b) under 24 years are currently registered as unemployed in (i) England, (ii) Yorkshire and Humberside, (iii) West Yorkshire and (iv) the Kirklees area; and in each case, what proportion of them have been unemployed for a period of 52 weeks or more.

Mr. Lang: The following information is available in the Library. The figures relate to unemployed claimants on 9 January 1986, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age and duration is available.

The table shows the numbers of unemployed claimants aged under 19 years and under 25 years (not available under 24 years) in the regions specified.

Numbers of unemployed claimants aged under 19 years and aged under 25 years

Region	Numbers of unemployed claimants	Percentage unemployed over 52 weeks
England:
under 19 years	276,038	14·4
under 25 years	980,818	27·6
Yorkshire and Humberside:
under 19 years	38,112	15·4
under 25 years	121,845	29·3
West Yorkshire Metropolitan County:
under 19 years	14,447	15·1
under 25 years	46,636	27·6
Kirklees Metropolitan Borough:
under 19 years	2,531	14·3
under 25 years	7,995	26·8

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Paymaster General what proportion of people were in work in Amber Valley and Derbyshire for (a) 1970, (b) 1975 and (c) the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Lang [pursuant to his reply, 28 February 1986, c. 730]: The available information comes from the census of population and is as follows. Comparable figures for 1975 are not available.

Proportion of the population of working age who were in employment*

	1971 per cent.	1981 per cent.
Amber Valley	70·1	71·8
Derbyshire	70·2	70·1

* Men aged 15-64 inclusive and women aged 15-59 inclusive in 1971; men aged 16-64 inclusive and women aged 16-59 inclusive in 1981.

Youthline Scheme

Mr. Gould asked the Paymaster General if he will take steps to restore the 50 premium places on the youthline scheme in Barking, Waltham Forest and Redbridge and cancel the decision to reduce the number of such places to 35.

Mr. Trippier: No. The distribution of premium places is the responsibility of the Manpower Services Commission's area offices in consultation with Area Manpower Boards and referral services such as the careers service. Eleven further premium places have become available in the London north-east area, and a sub committee of the area manpower board will meet on 14 March to consider proposals from providers before making a final decision about their allocation.

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Caborn asked the Paymaster General how many grade IB Health and Safety Executive inspectors he expects to leave the Health and Safety Executive in 1986 based on previous years; and how many Health and Safety Executive grade IB inspectors are to be appointed in 1986.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 3 March 1986, c. 7]: Between 1982 and 1985 the number of factory inspectors leaving the Health and Safety Executive each year was between six and 12. It is planned to recruit some 35 factory inspectors during 1986-87. All appointments will be as inspector class II, the basic training grade.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations from students he has received on the level of student grants.

Mr. Walden: I refer the hon. Members to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Members for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) and Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton).

34. Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals to discuss the present level of student grants.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend last met the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals to discuss the present level of student grants, among other topics, on 17 February 1986.

61. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the National Union of Students to discuss the present level of student support.

89. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the National Union of Students about student grants.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend last met NUS representatives to discuss student financial support on 3 December 1984; and I last met them on 12 February to discuss the level of grant and the effect of the proposed changes in social benefits. Other recent meetings have been held with NUS representatives to discuss points made by them in correspondence.

65. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the National Union of Students to discuss the level of travel grants.

Mr. Walden: My predecessor the hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) met NUS representatives to discuss the level of travel grants on several occasions. He last met them on 12 November 1985.

Teachers' Pay Dispute

8. Mr. Norris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the current situation on the teachers' pay dispute; and if he will make a statement.

22. Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the teachers' dispute.

37. Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the teachers' pay dispute.

38. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the teachers' dispute.

42. Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the current situation on the teachers' pay dispute; and if he will make a statement.

70. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the current situation on the teachers' pay dispute; and if he will make a statement.

86. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the teachers' strike.

93. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will outline the latest situation regarding the teachers' dispute.

102. Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the teachers' pay dispute.

82. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on what he now proposes to do to end the teachers' dispute in view of the fact that the membership of the National Union of Teachers has voted to continue its industrial action in its most recent ballot.

Sir Keith Joseph: I am glad that yesterday the Burnham committee finally concluded a pay settlement for 1985. I regret that this does not mean an end to the irresponsible disruption of pupils' education in the schools. I hope that teachers intent on that course will consider their position very carefully and resume normal working. The pupils need and deserve to get back to normal.

16. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many meetings he has held with (a) teachers' unions and (b) the employer's side since the commencement of the teachers' pay dispute, primarily or wholly concerned with the resolution of that dispute.

Sir Keith Joseph: Since February 1985 I have had about a dozen meetings with teacher unions and about half a dozen with groups of employer representatives at which the teachers' dispute might be regarded as the main subject under consideration.

98. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the outstanding issues on restructuring teachers' pay, promotions and conditions of service.

Sir Keith Joseph: The outstanding issues remain as when I made a statement on them in August of last year. The Government continue to look for a clear definition of the range of teachers' duties linked to their contracts of employment and a pay structure providing better pay and career opportunities for effective teachers.

Continental School Hours

15. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the financial effects of introducing continental school hours.

Mr. Dunn: I assume my hon. Friend is referring to a school day which starts much earlier than now and ends at about 1 o'clock or 2 o'clock. Such a day is found on the continent only in Denmark, Italy and Germany. It is not possible to estimate the cost of changing to it, as it would vary considerably from school to school.

General Certificate of Secondary Education Examinations

17. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what extra resources he plans to make available for the funding of the general certificate of secondary education examinations.

Mr. Chris Patten: The general criteria for the GCSE provide that syllabuses and methods of assessment should not make unreasonable demands on human or financial resources. The Government's expenditure plans should allow authorities to make appropriate provision for the GCSE provided that they take advantage of the scope of efficiency savings and contain their costs. However, my right hon. Friend has received representations on this issue and has undertaken to give the matter further consideration.

Schools (Toilet Facilities)

18. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the number of primary schools with outside toilets.

Mr. Dunn: The report "A Study of School Building", published jointly by the Department and the Welsh Office in 1977, found that there were at the time some 7,000 primary schools in England and Wales with outside toilets. The Department is currently carrying out a sample survey of the improvement needs of the existing stock of school buildings. This will include information on improvements to toilet accommodation where this is below regulation standards.

28. Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the number of schools, built before 1946, which have outside toilets.

69. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the number of schools with outside toilets.

Mr. Dunn: The report "A Study of School Building", published jointly by the Department and the Welsh Office in 1977, found that there were at that time some 7,000 primary and some 600 secondary schools with outside toilets. Of these, about 6,000 primary and about 600 secondary schools had their oldest accommodation built prior to 1946. The Department is currently carrying out a sample survey of the improvement needs of the existing stock of school buildings. This will include information on improvements to toilet accommodation where this is below regulation standards.

Higher Education (Statistics)

20 Mr. Lewis Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he can yet update the information on the proportion of young people entering higher education in the United Kingdom and other European countries, respectively; and if he can give the most recently available analogous data for other European countries, the United States of America and Japan.

Mr. Walden: The readily available information is given in the following table:

All New Entrants to Higher Education as a percentage of the relevant young persons' age group

	a Year	b Age	c New entrants to higher education per relevant population*
United Kingdom	1983	18-20	†30·1

* New entrants (all ages) to full-time and part-time higher education as a percentage of the average population in the most relevant age group. This is the age group, shown in column b, which includes 80 per cent. of new entrants to higher education. The average population is calculated by dividing the total population of the group by the number of years involved.

† Part-time new entrants included to aid international comparisons. Overseas students are excluded, as are postgraduates and others with a higher education qualification. Excludes students studying for higher education qualifications outside of the public education system other than nursing and paramedical students at DHSS establishments. If included the UK figure would be around 40 per cent.

‖ University only.

¶ Regular first year students.

• Includes private sector colleges and may include re-entrants.

University Staff (Pay)

23. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many representations he received concerning the recent protest by university staff concerning rates of pay.

Sir Keith Joseph: Following the strike called by the Association of University Teachers on 15 January, I received about 300 letters concerning rates of pay.

Schools (Repairs and Maintenance)

25. Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the state of repairs and maintenance in schools.

26. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received about the present level of expenditure on repairs and maintenance in schools.

41. Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the level of expenditure on repairs and maintenance in schools.

73. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from local education authorities about the state of repairs and maintenance in schools.

84. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received about the state of repair and maintenance in schools.

94. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the National Economic Development Council about the state of repairs and maintenance in schools in England and Wales.

62. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the Building Employers Confederation about the state of repair and maintenance of schools in England and Wales.

Mr. Dunn: The question of school repair and maintenance was discussed at last month's meeting of NEDC, which my right hon. Friend attended. In addition, my Department received last April a copy of a Building Employers Confederation publication entitled "Building — the Nation's needs: Spotlight on Education Buildings" which included comments on school building maintenance. More generally, this issue has been covered in the report last May from Her Majesty's Inspectorate on the effect on education provision of LEA expenditure policies in 1984, in a report in October 1985 from the National Confederation of Parent Teacher associations and in 1985 conference resolutions from the Council of Local Education Authorities (CLEA) and the Campaign for the Advancement of State Education (CASE). My right hon. Friend and I also receive letters on this subject from time to time.

Falling Rolls

27. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what advice has been given to local education authorities engaged in the reorganisation of their schools due to falling rolls.

Mr. Dunn: Advice on the statutory procedures and my right hon. Friend's policies is contained in DES circulars 2/80, 2/81 and 4/82 and administrative memorandum 4/84. In addition, the White Paper "Better Schools" (Cmnd. 9469) proposes principles on the minimum desirable size of schools.

Private Schools

31. Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his powers of supervision and inspection in respect of private schools.

Mr. Dunn: I refer the hon. Member to chapter 12 of the White Paper "Better Schools" (Cmnd. 9469) published last March.

36. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he is taking to encourage people to set up private schools.

Mr. Dunn: No encouragement is needed. Any person may establish an independent school, subject to the requirements of part III of the Education Act 1944.

Learning Difficulties (Private Sector)

32. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will bring forward proposals to harness resources from the private sector to improve the education of children with special learning difficulties.

Mr. Dunn: There is a long tradition of voluntary support for special education, including the provision of non-maintained special schools, and of co-operation with the maintained sector. My right hon. Friend appreciates the value of this support, but does not see that at present it needs further encouragement by any specific action on his part.

Lindop Report

33. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the Lindop report, Cmnd. 9501, "Academic Validation in Public Sector Higher Education".

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to announce his proposals in the light of the Lindop report on the review of public sector course validation.

Sir Keith Joseph: I hope to announce the Government's conclusion following their consideration of the Lindop committee's report shortly.

University Funding

35. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has had from the Scottish and Open Universities, respectively, concerning their future funding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: Each of the Scottish universities made a detailed submission to the University Grants Committee last autumn, as part of the committee's major review of funding for the period 1986-87 to 1989-90. Four of them sent copies of the main parts of their submissions to my right hon. Friend. The UGC intends to announce the first outcomes of its review in May.

The Open University Visiting Committee advised my right hon. Friend in November 1985 about the university's funding. My right hon. Friend made additional funds available and the university was advised of its revised grants on 7 January this year. Copies of the visiting committee's report and of the grants letter were placed in the Library on 14 January.

Research Resources

39. Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he is taking to increase the availability of resources for research.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend considers the resources that can be made available for research within his programme in the course of the annual public expenditure surveys.

School Maintenance

40. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what guidance he gives to local education authorities on the level of expenditure on school maintenance.

Mr. Dunn: Last year my Department published architects and building group design note 40 ("Maintenance and Renewal in Educational Buildings") which recommends that the assessment of maintenance needs should be related to the ascertained condition of an authority's buildings and their individual elements. Because local and particular needs are bound to vary widely, the design note does not recommend the use of general yardsticks or norms for assessing maintenance expenditure.

Schools (Police Relations)

43. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the refusal of certain schools in London to admit police officers for educational purposes.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) on 30 January at c. 571.

Parental Choice

44. Mr. Ottaway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is considering any measures to broaden further parents' choice of schools.

Mr. Dunn: The Government have no present plans to take further the substantial advances represented by the Education Act 1980, but continue to explore ways in which this might be achieved.

90. Mr. Portillo asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will take further steps to give to parents the opportunity to educate their children outside the maintained sector.

Mr. Dunn: There is no obligation on parents to send their children to schools in the maintained sector. The assisted places scheme made independent schools available to a wider range of parents. The Government have no present plans to extend the scheme although they continue to consider ways in which parental choice might be further widened.

Drug Abuse

45. Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what role he intends schools to play in combating drug abuse.

Mr. Dunn: Schools have a vital role to play in helping to combat drug abuse. By using their skills and experience, and with the benefit of material and expertise from professional agencies, teachers are able to inform young people of the dangers of experimenting with drugs and help those who are at risk. The Government have announced a number of measures to help them in this role, including the publication of a booklet "Drug Misuse and the Young" which provides information for teachers about the drugs problem; the appointment of drug advisers in each local education authority to stimulate and co-ordinate action within the education service aimed at combating drug misuse and the funding of the preparation by the Health Education Council of curriculum materials on drugs education for use in schools.

Leicester Grammar School

47. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to be able to grant assisted places status to Leicester grammar school.

Mr. Dunn: Financial constraints rule out any enlargement of the scheme at present.

National Union of Teachers

49. Mr. Couchman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met representatives from the National Union of Teachers.

Sir Keith Joseph: I last met representatives of the National Union of Teachers on 19 November 1985.

Professional Association of Teachers

50. Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to meet representatives from the Professional Association of Teachers.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have received no request, but the association knows of my readiness to meet it.

Inner London Teachers Association

51. Mr. Maples asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to meet officers of the Inner London Teachers Association.

Sir Keith Joseph: No. But I share the concern expressed by the noble Lord Harris of Greenwich in another place on 5 February, at column 1234, about this organisation.

Universities (Research and Development)

52. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the funding of research and development in United Kingdom universities.

Mr. Walden: It is estimated that expenditure on research and development in GB universities by source of funds increased as follows:

£ million cash

Source of Funds	1981-82	1983-84
UGC*	484	551 (Financial year)
Research Councils† grants and contracts	103	134 (Academic year)
Other research grants† and contracts	119	168 (Academic year)

* Estimate taken from the Annual Review of Government Funded R & D 1985.
† UGC Statistics Volume 3 (Finance).

In addition a substantial part of UGC equipment grant (£83·6 million in the academic year 1983-84) and Computer Board grant (£32·5 million in the financial year 1983-84) will have been used to support research.

Schools (Lunchtime Supervision)

53. Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is satisfied with the take-up by local authorities of money set aside for assistance with lunchtime supervision.

Mr. Chris Patten: Yes; 42 per cent. of LEAs have now put forward applications. By 3 March applications had been received from the following local education authorities:

Gloucestershire
Berkshire
Redbridge
Bradford
Hereford and Worcester
Hillingdon
Bury Harrow
Newham
Durham
South Tyneside
North Yorkshire
Surrey
Buckinghamshire
Shropshire
Nottinghamshire

Somerset
Suffolk

Universities (Freedom of Speech)

54. Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has yet completed his consideration of the contents of the guidelines issued by the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals on freedom of speech and lawful assembly; and if he will make a statement.

77. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has yet reached a conclusion as to whether the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals guidelines on freedom of speech and lawful assembly raise questions he would wish to discuss with the committee.

103. Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has completed his consideration of the guidelines for the protection of freedom of speech in universities issued by the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend recently discussed the guidelines with the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals. As a result of that discussion the committee chairman has written to reiterate the universities' unequivocal and forthright support for freedom of speech, and making it clear that nothing in their guidance was intended to afford a pretext for cancelling a meeting other than in the most exceptional circumstances.

Swann Report

55. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on progress made on the implementation of the recommendations of the Swann report.

Mr. Chris Patten: Action is continuing on the various initiatives described by my right hon. Friend in his response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) on 17 July 1985 at columns 162-64, and in my response to a question from the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) on 18 November 1985 at columns 1-3. In particular, the working group on the collection of ethnically based statistics on teachers held its first meeting in February. The report of the working group on the collection of ethnically based statistics on school pupils is now being finalised. Regulations governing the in-service teacher training grants scheme have been amended to allow its extension from September 1986 to cover teaching and the curriculum in a multi-ethnic society. A conference has been held for representatives of the teacher training institutions to discuss the form the new courses might take. Her Majesty's Inspectorate is holding a conference on 5 and 6 March—to be attended by chief education officers and others—on the implications of the Swann report for local education authorities with few, if any, ethnic minority pupils. An Education Bill was introduced in another place on 19 February which will give parents, including those from the ethnic minorities, greater involvement in schools. Parental representation on governing bodies will be increased and there will be a new category of governor, normally co-opted by the governing body, with the aim of strengthening links with the community served by the school. Governing bodies are also to be made more accountable to all parents through an annual report and meeting.

Repairs and Maintenance

57. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many local education authorities budgeted to reduce their expenditure in real terms on repairs and maintenance in 1984-5.

59. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many local education authorities budgeted to reduce their expenditure on maintenance in real terms in 1984-85.

Mr. Dunn: Detailed information on LEA expenditure in 1984-85 is not yet available. In 1983-84, 32 LEAs spent less in real terms, as measured by the GDP deflator, on the repair and maintenance of school and colleges, than in 1982-83. The majority of LEA raised their spending in real terms between the two years; nationally the increase was 8 per cent.

Social Worker Education

58. Mr. Ward asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether Her Majesty's Government will undertake a review of social worker education.

Mr. Walden: The Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work has issued a number of broad recommendations on ways in which social work training might be reformed. The council will in due course present developed proposals to the Government.

Higher Education

64. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he now expects to be in a position to publish the White Paper on higher education.

Mr. Walden: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) on 4 February 1986 at column 111.

GCSE Examination

66. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress has been made with training teachers to undertake the new GCSE courses, examinations, project work and assessments.

85. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on progress towards the introduction of general certificate of secondary education examinations.

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress he has made implementing the new general certificate of secondary education examinations.

92. Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the latest position regarding the introduction of the new general certificate of secondary education examination syllabus.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer the hon. Members to the answers which I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) and to the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy).

Technical Schools

67. Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will consider the reintroduction of technical schools for pupils aged 13 years and over.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend is always ready to consider statutory proposals and policy suggestions but has no current plans to reintroduce technical schools. The Government's policy, explained in the White Paper "Better Schools", is that the education of all pupils of compulsory school age should be broad and balanced and should contain a strong practical and technical element. The technical and vocational education initiative is exploring how such an element might best be developed for 14 to 18-year olds.

Teachers

71. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has on the subject specialisation of the teachers who have left the profession during the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Chris Patten: The latest period for which relevant information is available is the year ending 31 March 1984. Information is given for full-time teachers who left maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in England.

* Full-time teachers only. Moves from one full-time post to another within the maintained NPS schools sector are excluded, as are moves to full-time teaching posts in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in Wales. About 5 per cent. overall of the levers shown went to full-time teaching posts in other maintained, assisted or grant-aided establishments (mainly special schools and establishments of further education). Further percentages, unquantified but probably small, of those shown may have gone to part-time teaching posts in maintained nursery, primary or secondary schools or other maintained, assisted or grant-aided establishments in England and Wales; or full-time or Part-time teaching posts in universities, independent establishments, Scotland, Northern Ireland or overseas.

† Subject of qualification available for graduates only.

‡ Each graduate teacher has been allocated to the first degree subject named on that teachers' record, except where the first-named subject was education and a second subject was named. In these latter cases teachers have been allocated to the second-named subject. The subject education has been used only where there was no other second subject.

Science Budget

72. Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received on the size of the science budget for 1986-87.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend has received 161 representations about the resources available for science; these generally relate to the Government's plans for science funding over a period rather than the budget for a specific year.

Adult Education

75. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will next meet the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission to discuss the role of the commission in developing adult education.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has quarterly meetings with the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission to discuss its role and activities. The agenda for the next meeting—due on 26 March—has yet to be agreed. In addition, there are other meetings between the Department and the commission at various levels, including my own, to discuss particular issues as they arise and in the course of co-operation on joint initiatives.

State Schools (Expansion)

78. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will take steps to ensure that popular schools in the state sector are free to expand.

Mr. Dunn: There are no statutory constraints on expanding popular schools, except to the extent that this might involve the significant enlargement of the premises, or an intention substantially to reduce admissions at another school, either of which would require the procedures set down in sections 12 to 15 of the Education Act 1980 to be followed. Expansion of popular schools may not necessarily be consistent with the efficient use of limited resources, but, with that proviso, the Government would welcome measures to allow for the greater satisfaction of parental preferences.

Primary Schools

79. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will institute an immediate review on the structural condition of primary school buildings.

Mr. Dunn: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 10 February at column 320 to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett).

Youth Training Scheme

80. Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans there are to integrate educational qualifications with the two-year YTS.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Manpower Services Commission, having consulted the Education Departments, has established a YTS certification board under the chairmanship of Mr. Peter Reay of Cadbury Schweppes plc. Members of the board are representatives of the City and Guilds of London Institute, the Business and Technician Education Council, the Royal Society of Arts and the Scottish Vocational Education Council.

It will be for that board to secure co-ordination of qualifications available within YTS to ensure that every trainee has the opportunity to progress towards an appropriate qualification. Such qualifications may be those offered by the organisations in membership of the board, or may be those offered by others. The MSC is particularly aware of the need to ensure that qualifications such as O-levels (and, from 1988, GCSE) and A-levels are available to those trainees for whom these represent suitable avenues for progress in working life.

MSC (Area Manpower Boards)

81. Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about educational representation within the area manpower boards of the Manpower Services Commission

Mr. Chris Patten: Appointments to the area manpower boards are made by the Manpower Services Commission. Each of the area manpower boards includes amongst its members a representative of the education service, usually a chief education officer, and a representative of professional education interests, normally a college principal.

Science and Mathematics Teachers

83. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has on the number of unfilled vacancies for science and mathematics teachers in secondary schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The most recent data supplied by local eduation authorities indicate 337 and 304 unfilled vacancies for science and mathematics teachers respectively in England and Wales in January 1985 out of a total of 2,035 vacancies for all subjects, which is less than 1 per cent. of the secondary teacher force. When account is taken of each subject's share of curriculum time the data indicate that authorities have relatively greater difficulty in meeting the demand for teachers of physics and mathematics than for secondary subjects generally. The Government are seeking to improve the supply of teachers in these particular subjects, through support for a revised pay structure for teachers, through a bursary scheme for students on relevant training courses, and through consideration of a range of other possible measures.

Science Policy

87. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the objectives of Her Majesty's Government in its science policy.

Mr. Walden: The Department's aim in science is to maintain and enhance the strength and quality of the science base in higher education and the research councils. Consonant with this, the objectives are: to encourage greater concentration and selectivity of research activities; closer and better working with industry and commerce; more funding from private sector sources; better management yielding greater value for money; and increased flexibility enabling faster response to new scientific opportunities; to keep under review the balance between international and national scientific endeavours; and thereby to strengthen the knowledge and skills of the United Kingdom in science and technology, and improve the efficiency, competitiveness and innovative capacity of the United Kingdom economy.

Physics and Mathematics

88. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the percentage of the school population never experiencing being taught by either a physics or mathematics graduate teacher.

Mr. Chris Patten: Information is not available in the form requested. However, a survey of a sample of maintained secondary schools in England carried out by this Department in 1984 gives the following information:

Percentage of pupils studying subject

	Year groups 1-3	Year groups 4-5
Physics	34	36
Mathematics	94	97
Remedial mathematics	6	4

Percentage of periods taught by full-time teachers for whom this was a main subject of Bachelor of Education or other degree

	Year groups 1-3	Year groups 4-5	Sixth forms
Physics	44	51	75
Mathematics	37	46	75
Remedial mathematics	—	1	—

Vocational Education

91. Mr. Peter Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has discussed with the National Association of Head Teachers its proposals to him for more vocational education for some pupils from the age of 14 years.

Mr. Chris Patten: I will be meeting members of the National Association of Head Teachers later this month to discuss their consultative document, "A Policy 14-18".

Voluntary Aided Schools

95. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his policy towards voluntary aided schools.

Mr. Dunn: The Government continue to value highly the contribution made by aided and other voluntary schools to the diversity of the maintained sector of education and are committed to the dual system which facilitates this.

Adverse Weather (School Closures)

96. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has on the number of schools that have had to close due to the recent cold weather.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not collected centrally.

Teachers (No-disruption Policy)

97. Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had with teaching unions and education authorities about the possibility of the adoption of a no-disruption policy by groups of teachers.

Sir Keith Joseph: My discussions with local authority employers and teacher unions have often covered the question of a bargain which would bring a lasting end to disruption, but a no-disruption agreement has not been specifically discussed. I am aware, of course, that the Professional Association of Teachers has a general policy of not engaging in disruption.

Pre-compulsory Schooling

99. Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of the relevant age groups are in some form of pre-compulsory schooling; and what was the comparable figure for 1979.

Mr. Dunn: In 1985 43 per cent. of 3 and 4-year olds (excluding rising fives) attended maintained nursery schools, nursery classes or infant classes in primary schools. Both the percentage rate of participation and the actual numbers were the highest ever. The comparable percentage for 1979 was 37 per cent.

School (Leicestershire)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the increase in real terms in central Government financial support for education provision by Leicestershire county council in the last five years for which records are available; and what has been the equivalent increase in direct central Government support to independent schools in Leicestershire in the corresponding period.

Mr. Dunn: The major part of central Government support for education provision by local authorities is through rate support grants, in particular the block grant. This is unhypothecated and authorities have discretion over how it is used; it is not possible to identify any particular amount as being in support of education. There is no direct central Government support to independent schools.

Oxfordshire

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the allocation in real terms for educational capital projects for Oxfordshire in 1986 and for the past five years.

Mr. Dunn: The following are the allocations of prescribed expenditure made by my right hon. Friend under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 to the Oxfordshire education authority, expressed in 1984-85 real terms:

Year	Allocation £000's
1981-82	3,714
1982-83	4,656
1983-84	4,186
1984-85	3,245
1985-86	3,476
1986-87	1,873

The following are the allocations for capital expenditure by the governors of voluntary aided and special agreement schools in the area of the Oxfordshire education authority on which my right hon. Friend was prepared to pay grant, expressed in 1984-85 real terms:

Year	Allocation £000's*
1981-82	†
1982-83	51
1983-84	58
1984-85	15
1985-86	108
1986-87	428

Notes:

* The allocations shown are those announced just before the start of the financial year in question and do not include possible later revisions.

† Allocations for 1981-82 were made on a different basis from those for later years and have therefore been excluded.

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) by what criteria Oxfordshire county council was allocated money to be spent in 1986 on school capital projects;

(2) why he has made a reduction of 43 per cent. in the amount that Oxfordshire is allowed to spend on capital projects on education in 1986.

Mr. Dunn: The allocations made by my right hon. Friend under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 are not money grants but represent limits on the capital spending which local education authorities may undertake. The allocations are unhypothecated sums to cover all LEA capital expenditure but LEAs are notified of the notional elements for schools and for further education as an indication of how the allocation was calculated. However, LEAs are free to apply their allocations as they wish and may supplement or vary them by using the flexibilities available to them under the Act.

In calculating the schools element of the allocations for 1986-87, my right hon. Friend made allowance for authorities' expenditure on projects already under way (to the extent that he had allowed for such expenditure when setting provisional indications for 1986-87 in January 1985); took account of authorities' statutory need to undertake new work to provide school places required as a result of local increases or shifts in population; sought, in accordance with his stated policies on falling rolls, to take into account authorities' priorities for new improvement projects in connection with the removal of surplus school places; and, so far as resources permitted, made allowance for modest progress to be made in the provision of nursery and special education and the improvement of the school building stock. These criteria were applied to all LEAs' plans and the schools element of the allocation set for Oxfordshire education authority reflects the extent to which that LEA's capital expenditure plans were in accord with my right hon. Friend's priorities.

In calculating the allocations for capital expenditure by the governors of voluntary aided and special agreement schools on which he was prepared to pay grant in 1986-87, my right hon. Friend took into account, within the resources available to him, governors' estimates of expenditure to which they were committed on projects already under way; the need for new or expanded aided schools in areas of population growth; the duty upon governors to implement statutory proposals which he had approved; and the need for work to make good the serious dilapidation of buildings.

Pupil-Teacher Ratios

Mr. Hind asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science to what extent pupil-teacher ratios have changed since 1979.

Mr. Dunn: The pupil-teacher ratios within maintained primary and secondary schools and the overall pupil-teacher ratio for all teachers employed by local education authorities in England are as follows:

January of year	Pupil-teacher ratio within maintained primary schools	Pupil-teacher ratio within maintained secondary schools	Overall pupil-teacher ratio
1979	23·1	16·7	18·9
1980	22·7	16·6	18·7
1981	22·6	16·6	18·6
1982	22·5	16·6	18·5
1983	22·3	16·5	18·1
1984	22·1	16·2	17·9
1985	22·2	16·1	17·8

Burnham Committee

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science on what basis he allocates seats on the Burnham committee as between the National Union of Teachers and the Professional Association of Teachers; and if he will now revise these allocations so as to reflect more exactly total memberships of those unions.

Sir Keith Joseph: In reviewing representation on the teachers' panel of the Burnham primary and secondary committee I, like my predecessors, take account of the numbers in membership of the teacher associations and the nature of their membership. The teachers' panel was recently reconstituted to reflect the membership of the unions as at 31 December 1984 (the latest date for which figures are available for all associations).

School Closures

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what financial savings have been estimated to have arisen from the closure of schools following from his Department's circular 2/81, "Falling Rolls and Surplus Places," as supplied from local education authorities' estimates when submitting proposals.

Sir Keith Joseph: This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Primary Schools (Southampton)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the design capacity of primary schools in the city of Southampton and the number of pupils on the roll at each school.

Mr. Dunn: The Department does not hold records of the design capacity of individual schools.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Students (Benefits)

104. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what studies his Department has made on the effect of benefit changes on students.

Mr. Newton I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Leeds West (Mr. Meadowcroft) on 27 February at c. 682-83.

Blood Products (Heat Treatment)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied that heat treatment of blood products made available to haemophiliacs removes all reasonable risk of HTLV3 infection.

Mr. Whitney I am advised that the heat treatment processes currently used should inactivate any HTLV3 virus which might be present in the coagulation factor concentrates used by haemophiliacs. We have no evidence of transmission of the virus resulting from the use of the heat treated material currently available in this country.

Generic Drugs

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what steps are taken to seek to establish that every generic product has an identical bioequivalence as the original licensed proprietary product;

(2) what research is done to assess the bioequivalence of any recently introduced generic product.

Mr. Whitney Before the licensing authority will license any generic medicinal product, it considers whether a lack of bioequivalence would constitute a hazard for reasons of safety or lack of efficacy. Where it considers that such a hazard would exist it will not issue a licence until it has received, and been satisfied by the results of, in-vivo bioavailability studies in support of the licence application. Where the product is a solid dose form, the licensing authority must also be satisfied with the results of in-vitro studies, which the applicant is required to submit, on the liberation and dissolution rate of the active ingredient or ingredients.

Psychotherapy

Mr Bright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if discussions have taken place between officials of his Department and representatives of the professional bodies concerned about the regulation of the practice of psychotherapy.

Mr. Whitney No such discussions have taken place. As I said to my hon. Friend in a letter on 27 January 1986, it is for the professions themselves to resolve the various issues involved—and to reach a consensus view—before the question of statutory registration can be considered.

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many complaints his Department has received since 1979 alleging malpractice by practitioners of psychotherapy.

Mr. Whitney: Figures are not maintained routinely but our records show no such complaints in the past year.

Pensioner Households

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pensioner households receiving (a) certificated housing benefit and (b) standard housing benefit are subject to non-dependant deductions.

Mr. Major: Precise information is not available, as these details are not collected centrally. Our estimates suggest that there are about 180,000 pensioner households receiving certificated housing benefit, and 270,000 pensioner households receiving standard housing benefit, from which a deduction is made in respect of non-dependants.

Low-income Families

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what date he now proposes to publish the low-income family tables for 1983 derived from the family expenditure survey.

Mr. Newton: I am afraid the technical work in preparing the tables has taken longer than expected. However, we hope to publish them in the next few weeks.

Mortgage Payments

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give details of the total cost of mortgage interest payments in respect of supplementary benefit recipients for each of the years 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Newton: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him on 28 November 1985 at column 652. No later information is available.

Incomes

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of claimants who, as a result of the level of work expenses disregard, find (a) that their incomes would be no higher in work than out of it and (b) their incomes would be less than £5 higher in work than out of it.

Mr. Newton: I regret it is not possible to make these estimates as no information is available about claimants' work expenses, apart from that mentioned in my reply to the hon. Member on 3 March, or about their potential earnings in full-time work.

Local Authorities (Social Services Provisions)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to introduce legislation to oblige local authorities to put out to tender to private companies any of their social services provisions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The consultation paper on competition in the provision of local authority services issued on 14 February 1985 by my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment, for Scotland and for Wales, recognised the need to provide in the proposed legislation for certain social services activities to be exempted. There has been no change in this view.

Community Health Councils (Secretaries)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his Department's policy on whether a secretary of a community health council should ordinarily be regarded as a paid advocate within the meaning of the National Health Service (Services Committees and Tribunals) Regulations 1974; what steps he takes to ensure that the chairpersons of service committees are aware of this policy; and if he will consider amending the regulations on this matter.

Mr. Whitney: It is the Department's opinion that the secretary of a community health council should not ordinarily be regarded as a "paid advocate" within the meaning of the regulations as they now stand. When the regulations were drafted the possibility of CHC secretaries acting as patients' friend at hearings had not been envisaged and, as the question has not been tested in the courts, it is open to a service committee to take a different view. The Secretary of State has conveyed his opinion where it has been sought by family practitioner committees or community health councils. This regulation is being considered as part of a wider review of service committee regulations.

Cadaver Organs

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements exist for collaboration between doctors, chaplains and other appropriate hospital staff in approaching next-of-kin or near relatives of recently dead patients for permission to remove suitable organs in order to preserve life in another person; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Arrangements for collaboration between hospital staff in approaching relatives for permission to remove organs from cadavers for the purposes of transplantation are a matter for the staff concerned, in accordance with health authority policy. The Department actively encourages such collaboration, and the Chief Medical Officer wrote last year to the directors of all transplant units enclosing examples of good practice.

Brain Death

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give his best estimate of the number of people each year classified as brain-dead and certified as dead; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: In 1982 it was estimated that about 2,000 patients die in the United Kingdom each year in circumstances where brain death might be diagnosed. The total number of all deaths in the United Kingdom in 1984, the most recent year for which figures are available, was 564,966. Patients who are diagnosed as brain dead may be suitable as organ donors. As part of our campaign to increase the numbers of donor organs becoming available for transplantation, we are considering supporting a study which would seek to establish how many brain deaths occur and what might be done to increase the proportion where organ donation procedures are initiated.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration he has given to the concept of required request in relation to hospital doctors requesting consent for the removal of any organs for transplant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: I am informed that in some American states doctors attending patients who are diagnosed as brain dead are required by law either to ensure that requests for organ donation are made to the relatives, or to satisfy themselves that there are good reasons why such requests should not be made. In this country whether to remove organs from a brain-dead patient is a clinical matter for the doctors concerned, and I do not think it would be acceptable to make this subject to legal requirements. It might be possible to achieve similar results by means of a voluntary code of practice, but this would be a matter for the medical profession, and we are currently discussing the possibility with its representative bodies.

Bed and Breakfast Charges

Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the average charge paid for bed and breakfast in Slough by single claimants and couples, respectively, in each of the last three financial years.

Mr. Newton: I regret that no information is available centrally on the average charge paid for bed and breakfast by single claimants and couples in Slough in each of the last three financial years. Records of bed and breakfast charges are not kept routinely so that information could be obtained only by a special exercise that would be disproportionately expensive.

AIDS

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to the answer of 23 January, Official Report, column 307, what further advice has been given to health authorities; and if he will make a statement about any recent medical advances in relation to treatment of acquired immune deficiency syndrome about which he has information.

Mr. Whitney: No further advice has been issued to health authorities since my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend on 23 January at column 307. There is still no vaccine or specific treatment for the underlying immune deficiency but the Department continues to monitor developments in this field.

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of the total number of staff employed by his Department are women; how many of them are employed on a part-time basis; and how many are not eligible for an occupational pension.

Mr. Major: As at 1 January 1986 it is estimated that just over 63 per cent. of the Department's staff were women. It is further estimated 3,880 women were employed on a part-time basis on the same date. Most, if not all of them, work 15 hours a week or more and are therefore within the scope of the occupational pension scheme. The exact figure is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Precise figures on the number of women employed are collected annually and are available in May of each year.

Legal Proceedings

Mrs Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of legal proceedings have been instituted by private citizens against his Department during the last seven years.

Mr. Major: Information regarding the number of cases of legal proceedings instituted by private citizens against the Department in England and Wales during the last seven years is not readily available prior to 1985, and the cost of obtaining the information would be disproportionate.

Since the beginning of 1985 476 such cases (embracing applications for judicial review in the High Court, appeals to the Court of Appeal from decisions of social security commissioners, actions by way of writ in the High Court, county court actions and originating applications to industrial tribunals) have been counted. It is not possible to give precise figures because the conduct of litigation commenced against the Department is shared by the solicitor's office to the Department and Treasury Solicitor and there is no central point of control.

The figures do not include applications for leave to appeal and appeals to the Court of Appeal by private citizens against the decisions of the social security commissioners where the Secretary of State for Social Services was not a party. I have asked my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland to let the hon. Member have the information relating to Scotland, which is a separate jurisdiction.

Benefits

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the total spending which has been devoted by his Department to heating assistance benefits in each year since 1978-79 and the number of people who have submitted claims or qualified for such benefits in each year during the same period.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Volunteer Schemes

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will include victims support schemes in the programme of opportunities for volunteering; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: New arrangements have been made for 1986-87 to provide central Government funds for grants to local victim support schemes. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) on 14 January at column 545-546 that he proposed to make £136,000 available for this purpose through the national association of victims support schemes. Following last year's review, the conditions under which grants may be made in the DHSS opportunities for volunteering scheme have been amended to exclude victim support schemes as being more closely related to those of other Government Departments or public services.

Central Middlesex Hospital

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to when the Central Middlesex hospital went on to a yellow alert, and as to how many elderly patients have been admitted suffering from the effects of extreme cold weather.

Mr. Whitney: The Central Middlesex hospital went on to a yellow alert on Thursday 20 February 1986. I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the other information he seeks as it is not collected centrally. The hon. Member may, therefore, wish to contact the chairman of Brent health authority.

DEFENCE

Royal Naval Hospital, Haslar

Viscount Cranborne asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the standard of health care provided by the royal naval hospital, Haslar.

Mr. Lee: The standard of health care provided by the royal naval hospital, Haslar is just as good as that provided by a district general hosptial in the National Health Service.

Ethnic Monitoring

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to introduce ethnic monitoring to the services.

Mr. Lee: No decision has been taken on the introduction of ethnic monitoring to the services.

Crown Immunity

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to abolish Crown immunity in service hosptials.

Mr. Lee: No. Service hospitals are subject to the Service Discipline Acts and have military procedures to cover all aspects of their administration.

Ammunition

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Defence from which companies and for what amounts orders have been placed to meet his Department's small arms ammunition requirement for 1986-87.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Contracts for small arms ammunition for 1986-87 have been placed as follows:

a. 17 million rounds of 7.62mm 1 ball/1 tracer on Royal Ordnance Small Arms, Radway Green;

b. 4 million rounds of 5.56mm tracer on Fabrique Nationale, Belgium;

c. 15 million rounds of 9mm ball on Dynamit Nobel of West Germany.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Defence with which companies his Department has entered into price linked contracts for small arms ammunition since 1981.

Mr. Norman Lamont: None.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the procedure for the submission of bids by foreign ammunition firms for defence contracts; and on what criteria selections of contracts are made.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Bids are invited from recognised foreign ammunition firms that meet internationally agreed standards of quality. The criterion for selection is value for money, as stated by the Prime Minister on 13 January 1986, and as I made clear in the debate on the Army on 30 January 1986 at column 1182.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of his Department's 1986-87 small arms ammunition requirement will be open to overseas competition.

Mr. Norman Lamont: It has not yet been decided to what extent the 1986-87 purchase of small arms ammunition should reflect our stated intention of procuring about a quarter of the overall ammunition requirement for that year through competitive tendering.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Defence from which companies in the United Kingdom his Department has purchased small arms ammunition since 1981.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Purchases since 1981 have almost entirely been from Royal Ordnance plc. Apart from very minor requirements, the only other United Kingdom company from which purchases have been made is Eley Ltd.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Defence from which countries, and for what amounts, his Department has purchased small arms ammunition since 1975.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall write to the hon. Lady.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department plans to purchase additional ammunition from India.

Mr. Norman Lamont: We have no plans at present to buy ammunition from India.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's requirement for small arms ammunition for 1986-87.

Mr. Norman Lamont: We intend to order substantial further amounts of small arms ammunition in 1986-87. It is not our practice to disclose our total ammunition requirements.

Royal Ordnance Small Arms Ltd.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many people are employed at Royal Ordnance Small Arms Ltd., Radway Green, Cheshire, on a temporary basis;

(2) how many people are employed at Royal Ordnance Small Arms Ltd., at Radway Green, Cheshire and paid on an hourly, weekly, or monthly basis;

(3) how many people are employed at Royal Ordnance Small Arms Ltd., at Radway Green, Cheshire;

(4) how many people have been employed by Royal Ordnance Small Arms Ltd., Radway Green, Cheshire, for the years 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86, respectively.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The total work force at Radway Green at the end of March in each of the following years was:

	Number
1981	1,676
1982	1,576
1983	1,636
1984	1,962
1985	2,213

I understand that the present total is about 2,340. Detailed information about the work force is a matter for the company.

United States Bases

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the Ambassador's agreement of April 1950 regulating the presence of United States bases in the United Kingdom and the subsequent administrative agreement of 1953 are both still classified documents.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 10 February 1986, c. 385-6]: The status of the documents referred to by the hon. Member is being considered. This is likely to take a little time but as soon as the outcome is known I shall write to the hon. Member.

Service Personnel

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel were recorded as being absent without leave during 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 10 February 1986, c. 387-88]: The numbers of service personnel who were recorded as having deserted or being absent without leave in 1983, 1984 and 1985 were as follows:

	1983	1984	1985
Royal Navy	143	107	113
Royal Marines	6	3	4
Army	670	662	507
	838	788	633

The figures for the Royal Navy and Royal Marines include all those who were absent without leave for more than seven days during the year. The Army and RAF include all those who were absent without leave for more than 21 days. The figures for the RAF for 1985 are for the whole year; the figures for the Royal Navy and Army are up to the end of November 1985 only.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what procedure is followed subsequent to a unit suspecting one of its personnel of being absent without leave.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 10 February 1986, c. 387-88]: The procedures to be followed subsequent to a unit suspecting one of its personnel of being absent without leave are laid down in Queen's Regulations for the Royal Navy, chapter 19 articles 1920-1940; in Queen's Regulations for the Army chapter 5 paragraphs 207-210 and in Queen's Regulations for the Royal Air Force paragraphs 1085-1086. These regulations are supplemented by detailed administrative instructions. Copies of these documents are in the Library of the House.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel were imprisoned as a result of being found guilty of absence without leave during 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 10 February 1986, c. 387-88]: No service personnel were imprisoned solely as a result of being found guilty of absence without leave during the period 1983 to 1985.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel were held in a place of detention for periods in excess of 24 hours upon returning from a period of absence without leave during 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 10 February 1986, c. 387-388]: The information requested is not recorded by the three services and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. It does not automatically follow that an absentee returning to his unit will be held in detention or close arrest. An absentee may have acceptable reasons for his absence which makes disciplinary action unnecessary or he may have surrendered voluntarily.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel were found guilty of deliberate absenteeism but not imprisoned; and how many were not held in places of detention, on the grounds of mitigating circumstances regarding their action during 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 10 February 1986, c. 387-388]: The number of service men dealt with summarily for deliberate absenteeism and who were found guilty but not awarded custodial sentences is not centrally recorded. The following number of Royal Navy and RAF personnel were convicted of offences of desertion or absence without leave by courts-martial and not awarded custodial sentences:

	1983	1984	1985
Royal Air Force	1	—	1

In the case of the Army, statistics are not kept in a form which would allow them to be given save at disproportionate cost and effort.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Vehicle Manufacturers (State Aid)

76. Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the level of state aid from member countries of the European Economic Community to motor vehicle manufacturing companies over the last five years.

Mr. Alan Clark: Comprehensive information is not available, as details of aids notified to and approved by the Commission under article 93 of the EEC treaty are not normally disclosed to all member states.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will name those countries, which are multi-fibre arrangement signatories, which are regarded by his Department as having open markets for multi-fibre arrangement purposes.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government have said that in our view favourable treatment should be given to those developing countries whose own barriers to British exporters are low. This is a matter of degree, but Hong Kong, Macao and Singapore would seem to meet such a definition.

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he supports the increased growth rates in the multi-fibre arrangement quota system proposed by the European Commission.

Mr. Alan Clark: Some increases on existing growth rates may be justified, especially for the poorest countries and countries which themselves offer open markets.

Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will explain the administrative systems he envisages to control any liberalisation of children's clothing under the multi-fibre arrangement, having regard to equity as between the member states and the elimination of abuse.

Mr. Alan Clark: The question whether and to what extent children's clothing should be liberalised under a renewed MFA is still under discussion in the Community, taking account among other things of administrative practicability and possible problems of fraud. The method of administrative control will depend on the decision reached.

Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will name those countries which are multi-fibre arrangement signatories, which are regarded by his Department as genuinely poor countries for multi-fibre arrangement purposes.

Mr. Alan Clark: The present MFA does not provide for special treatment for the poorest countries, but the United Kingdom has argued that the renewed arrangements should do so. Whether to adopt the wider World Bank definition or the UN definition is still under discussion in the Community. The United Kingdom has argued for the wider one, which includes such countries as India, not covered by the narrower definition. The narrower the definition the more favourable the treatment that might be given to such countries.

General Motors (Imports)

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the number of General Motors-manufactured motor cars imported into the United Kingdom and made in the United Kingdom, respectively, for each of the last five calendar years.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Footwear Exports

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give the latest figures for the annual rate of exports of leather footwear to the United States of America and Canada.

Mr. Alan Clark: In 1985 United Kingdom companies exported leather footwear to the value of £16 million (884 thousand pairs) to the USA, and £3 million (230 thousand pairs) to Canada. These are provisional figures.

Kenya (Debt)

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations have been made in the last six months to the Government of Kenya regarding the repayment of commercial debts due to British creditors of Kenyan companies.

Mr. Alan Clark: Since September 1985 representations have been made to the Government of Kenya about two cases involving commercial debts owed to British creditors.

Private Mobile Radio

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what decisions have been taken on the award of licences to operate private mobile radio (PMR) systems in band III and on the licensing of further national wide-area radio-paging frequencies.

Mr. Pattie: I have received, and am very grateful for, the advice of the Director General of Telecommunications on applications for licences to operate nationwide pmr systems, systems in London, and further radiopaging licences. The Department has also considered applications to operate local pmr systems in band III in the areas of greatest demand outside London.

I have decided that the following applicants should be invited to participate in further discussions with the Department leading to the issue of those licences:

Band III Nationwide pmr (two networks of 100 channels each)

(a) a consortium of Pye Telecommunications; Digital Paging Systems (UK); Investors in Industry; Racal Telecommunications Group; and Securicor Communications.

(b) GEC Telecommunications.

London pmr (networks of 20 channels)

(a) London Car Telephones.

(b) Air Call.

(c) Relcom Communications.
(d) Sinclair Communications.
(e) National Radiofone.
Provincial pmr (networks of 5-19 channels)
Birmingham-National Radiofone.
Manchester/Merseyside-National Radiofone.
Nottingham-Zycomm Electronics.
Leeds/Bradford-RT Radiophones.
Glasgow/Edinburgh/Aberdeen-Tactico/National Radiofone (joint venture).
National wide-area radiopaging
153 MHz
(a) A consortium of Air Call, Digital Paging Systems (UK), Inter-City Paging and Pageboy Services (UK).
(b) A consortium of Mercury Communications and Motorola.
(c) Racal.
454 MHz
(d) Infowave.
(e) Millicom (UK).

In relation to pmr systems in band III, the applicants named will now be invited to discussions at the Department to define further the technical aspects of the proposed systems (including the degree of interconnection to the PSTN) and to discuss performance requirements that will be applied to the licence conditions. Licences will be granted when these discussions have been concluded and subject to the Department being satisfied that the licence conditions will be properly observed.

Licences will not be awarded at this stage in four of the other areas outside London for which applications were invited. This is because insufficient suitable applications were received.

In relation to national wide-area radiopaging, licences will be awarded following discussions about which frequencies should be assigned bearing in mind the need to make provision for future expansion of services. It may be appropriate for some of the above operators to be allocated frequencies in the band 138-141 MHz, rather than at 153 MHz.

Potatoes

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the tonnage of ware potatoes imported into the United Kingdom for the years 1983-84, 1984-85 and since 1 April 1985.

Mr. Gummer: I have been asked to reply.

For the crop years 1 June to 31 May, United Kingdom imports of ware potatoes were as follows:

	tonnes
1983-84	121,444
1984-85	63,909

During the period 1 June to 31 December 1985, the latest date for which figures are currently available, United Kingdom imports of ware potatoes totalled 53,613 tonnes.

United Kingdom imports of ware potatoes during the months of April and May 1985 were:

	tonnes
April 1985	5,554
May 1985	6,606

Source: Her Majesty's Customs and Excise.

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the tonnage of processed potatoes imported into the United Kingdom for the years 1983-84, 1984-85 and since 1 April 1985.

Mr. Gummer: I have been asked to reply.

For the crop years 1 June to 31 May, United Kingdom imports of processed potatoes were as follows:

	tonnes
1983-84	411,390
1984-85	368,528

During the period 1 June to 31 December 1985, the latest date for which figures are currently available, United Kingdom imports of processed potatoes totalled 195,439 tonnes.

United Kingdom imports of processed potatoes during the months of April and May 1985 were:

	tonnes
April 1985	29,453

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Students (Fees)

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recommendations have been issued about fees for students on courses of further and higher education in the academic year 1986-87.

Sir Keith Joseph: For the academic year 1986-87 I have recommended the following fee levels for home students and for students from other European Community countries. Fees for 1985-86 are shown in brackets.

Postgraduate courses	1,680	(1,632)
First degree and diploma courses	536	(520)

These recommended fees represent a 3 per cent. increase over those for 1985-86.

Other fees for home and European Community students are the responsibility of the local education authorities. I understand that the Council of Local Education Authorities has recommended fees for 1986-87 as follows. Fees for 1985-86 are shown in brackets.

	Advanced Further Education		Non-Advanced Further Education
Full-time	£536·00	(£520·00)	£342·00	(£321·00)
Sandwich/block release (weekly rate)	£14·90	(£14·50)	£9·50	(£9·00)
Part-time per course hour	50p	(50p)	32p	(30p)
Part-time annual fee for one session per week	£53·60	(£52·00)	£34·20	(£32·00)

* Other than first degree and diploma courses.

The Government's policy is that students from outside the European Community should pay fees that cover the cost of their education here. It is for institutions and local authorities to determine the fees to be charged to overseas students in the light of this policy and of their own circumstances.

For the universities, the University Grants Committee has recommended minimum fee levels for undergraduate and postgraduate courses as follows. Recommended minima for 1985-86 are shown in brackets.

Arts courses	3,480	(3,310)
Science courses	4,570	(4,350)
Clinical courses in medicine, dentistry and veterinary science	8,450	(8,050)

For local authority institutions, the Council of Local Education Authorities has recommended minimum fee levels as follows. Recommended minima for 1985-86 are shown in brackets.

Advanced courses	3,540	(3,310)
Non-advanced courses	1,947	(1,820)

Young Persons (Employment)

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if Her Majesty's Government have considered the impact on children's education of any increase in the employment of young persons which could result from changes in legislation proposed in the Shops Bill.

Mr. Dunn: The provisions of the law on the employment of schoolchildren, which are designed in part to safeguard their education, remain unchanged by the Shops Bill.

Schools (Capital Allocations)

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will list the criteria by which he decides the amount of public funds made available to governors of aided and state-aided schools; and if he will make a statement as to the level of grant for expenditure by governors of aided and state-aided schools in Devon;

(2) what is the capital allocation for voluntary-aided schools in every local authority in England (a) in total and (b) as a percentage of the total money made available in England by way of capital allocation for education;

(3) what is the capital allocation for 1986-87 for wholly supported schools in the public sector in every local authority in England.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested on allocations is set out in the table. The allocations made for expenditure at voluntary aided schools represent 8·7 per cent. of the total of capital allocations for education.

In allocating the resources available for capital expenditure by the governors of voluntary aided and special agreement schools on which he was prepared to pay grant in 1986-87, my right hon. Friend took into account governors' estimates of expenditure on projects already under way, the need for new or expanded aided schools in areas of population growth, the duty upon governors to implement statutory proposals which he had approved, and, to the extent that resources allowed, the need for work to make good the dilapidation of school buildings. The allocations which were set, including that for Devon education authority's area, reflect the extent to which governors' plans were in accord with my right hon. Friend's priorities.

Notes to Table:

* Allocations of prescribed expenditure are made under section 72 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act, 1980 and are unhypothecated grants to cover all LEA capital expenditure.

† LEAs are notified of the notional elements for schools and further education capital expenditure underlying the allocations as an indication of how thay were calculated. LEAs are free to apply their allocations as they wish.

‡ This expenditure is not prescribed expenditure and is assisted by grant from the Department. The allocations shown are those announced on 18 December 1985 and are subject to variation in the course of the 1986-87 financial year. There is considerable variation between LEAs in the proportion of schools which are aided.

Medical Research Council

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what units run by the Medical Research Council have been closed in each of the last three years; and which units are now threatened with closure.

Mr. Walden: The information is as follows:

Calendar year	Unit
1983	Lipid Metabolism
1984	Laboratory Studies of Tuberculosis Dental
1985	Pneumoconiosis Neurochemical Pharmacology

I understand that the possible closure of the following three units is at present under consideration:

The Trauma Unit, Manchester; the MRC Unit on Meural Mechanisms of Behaviour, London; and the Developmental Neurobiology Unit, London.

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give details of the Medical Research Council's expenditure for each of the last five years, broken down into the grants it gives and its own expenditure and the projected expenditure for the next three years, in cash and real terms.

Mr. Walden: The details are as follows:

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of (a) alpha rated and (b) other research projects by universities were funded by the Medical Research Council in each of the last five years; and how much uncommitted money the Medical Research Council currently has available to finance new projects and programmes or existing ones which may merit renewal.

Mr. Walden: The information is as follows:

The figures relate to short-term support only. Information on long-term support is not available.

I understand that in the academic year 1985-86 the MRC had uncommitted funds of £6·72 million to be spent on research grants in 1986-87.

Science Budget

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the amount of the science budget for each of the last five years in cash and real terms; what is the projected amount for each of the next three years; and if he will break it down to show the amounts in respect of the research councils, the British Museum, the Royal Society and the Fellowship of Engineering.

Mr. Walden: The following tables show the information requested. The cash terms figures (table 1) represent actual expenditures for the years up to 1984-85, the planned cash provisions for 1985-86 and 1986-87 (subject in the case of 1986-87, to parliamentary approval of the Supply Estimates in due course), and the amounts provisionally recommended by the Advisory Board for the Research Councils for 1987-88 and 1988-89.

PRIME MINISTER

Government Achievements

Mr. Hirst asked the Prime Minister if she will list the achievements of her Government since 1979 as they relate to Scotland.

The Prime Minister: In the area of industry and economic development, we established in 1981 Locate in Scotland, which has been highly successful in attracting inward investment. Through the Scottish Development Agency there has been a substantial programme of economic and environmental recovery in older urban and industrial areas, much increased unlocking of private sector investment, including £94·2 million through the LEG-UP (Local Enterprise Grants for Urban Projects) scheme and an extended range of programmes to promote technological change and industrial efficiency. Our support for the Highlands and Islands Development Board was reaffirmed following the report of the Scottish Affairs Committee. Enterprise zones have been established at Invergordon and Clydebank and in Tayside. We have created a national network of area tourist boards and extended the Scottish Tourist Board's powers to include promotional activity overseas.

Over 1,350 offers of regional selective assistance worth £362 million have been made for projects estimated to cost £4,100 million and promising to create or safeguard over 138,000 jobs. In 1984 responsibility for the payment of regional development grants in Scotland was transferred from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to the Secretary of State for Scotland. Since the transfer, over 1,200 applications for new regional development grants worth over £50 million and associated with project costs of around £420 million and 14,600 new jobs, have been approved. We have seen the introduction of the very successful better business and better technical services schemes which between them have attracted over 10,000 applications. Areas eligible for European Coal and Steel Community loans have been extended and a continuing and successful programme of case surgeries for businesses has been established.

Benefiting from the Government's policies on taxation and licensing, 1984 was a record year for oil and gas exploration and development in the North sea and 1985 a record for approval of new developments. Oil-related employment increased from nearly 42,000 in June 1979 to almost 64,000 by December 1985. With Government support, the electricity boards maintained supplies to consumers during the coal dispute while containing operating costs.

Over 124,000 young people have entered into the youth training scheme in Scotland since its inception in 1983. The expansion to a two-year programme from April 1986 will emphasise improved training leading to vocational qualifications. The community programme will train 21,000 adults in Scotland in 1985-86 and is expected to train up to 25,000 in 1986-87.

In education, major reforms to the structure of the curriculum and examinations for pupils aged 14 to 16 have begun with the introduction of new standard grade courses and examinations. In addition, Scotland is playing a full part in the technical and vocational education initiative with six projects under way and more in preparation. The level of educational attainment in Scotland has improved; the percentage of school leavers with at least one Scottish certificate of education qualification increasing from 68 per cent. in 1978-79 to 74 per cent. in 1983-84. The percentage of school leavers who held at least one SCE higher grade has also increased in the same period from 26 to 33 per cent.

Through the Scottish 16+ action plan, the Government have introduced an innovative approach to the provision of non-advanced further education in the form of modular courses leading to the award of a new national certificate by the Scottish Vocational Education Council. The new system provides increased flexibility for students and makes available new opportunities for adults with retraining needs. It has won widespread praise as a major advance in educational thinking and the speed with which it has been implemented provides a clear indication of the Government's commitment to improving the quality of vocational education. In the first year of operation 35,000 students from nearly 500 presenting centres throughout Scotland successfully undertook courses leading to the award of the SCOTVEC national certificate.

Other developments have been the introduction of a new right to parents to choose their children's school; the introduction of a requirement on education authorities to make widely available information about schools under their management; the publication of HMI reports of inspections of schools and colleges of further education; a scheme of assisted places at the fee paying schools; and the introduction of an improved approach to the education of handicapped pupils and other pupils with special educational needs.

We have also funded a new building for the Royal Scottish Academy of Music and Drama in Glasgow, a new National Science Reference Library, and additional teaching accommodation at Robert Gordon's Institute of Technology, Aberdeen. We have supported the establishment of the Scottish Community Education Council, International Youth Year 1985, the Burrell Gallery in Glasgow and the new Gallery of Modern Art, Edinburgh.

£14 million has been allocated to create additional places in engineering and technology in the Scottish central institutions and over 200 new student places have been created at Scottish universities participating in the engineering and technology programme. Computers have been introduced into schools and colleges.

On the social work front, new legislation has made substantial improvements in the adoption and fostering of children. There has been an improvement in the use of secure accommodation for children. The arrangements for financial support of list D schools have been rationalised.

We have made several major legislative changes in Scottish criminal law and procedure including the introduction of new police powers of detention and search, compensation orders for the victims of crime, restrictions on alcohol at football grounds and the introduction of fines enforcement officers in the sheriff court. We have maintained support for a strong and effective police service by increasing police numbers and awarding substantial improvements in pay and conditions. We have approved a major computerisation project for the Scottish Criminal Record Office serving all forces. The Scottish crime squad is being expanded to supplement the force's increased efforts in countering trafficking in drugs. The rate of police grant will be increased in 1986-87.

In family and civil law, a range of useful reforms have been effected, including the extension to the sheriff court of concurrent jurisdiction in divorce, and protection of the occupancy rights of spouses in the matrimonial home.

In health, additional resources have facilitated an 11 per cent. increase in the numbers of hospital medical and dental staff and nurses and midwives. The proportion of resources devoted to the administration of the service has been progressively reduced. 42 major new hospital developments have provided a total of over 4,200 beds and over 440 day places. We have reformed the mental health legislation. We have provided grant support for facilities for drug misusers and have promoted a health education campaign to counter drug misuse.

£40 million has been spent on prison improvements. A new prison is nearing completion at Shotts and major redevelopment work to Greenock prison and Polmont young offenders institute is virtually complete. The substantial refurbishment of Peterhead prison and a wide range of other projects have improved the accommodation and facilities for both inmates and staff.

In civil defence, the functions of local authorities have been strengthened and extended and the range of activities attracting 100 per cent. grant has been increased.

Over £500 million has been invested in the motorway and trunk road network, and about 200 miles of motorways and major trunk road improvements have been completed. The reconstruction of the A9 from Perth to Easter Ross is nearing completion; substantial progress has been made on the upgrading to dual carriageway standard of the Perth-Dundee-Aberdeen route; and 21 bypasses have been opened, relieving communities of through traffic. A further 43 miles of motorway and major trunk road improvements, including five bypasses, are under construction. Over the same period, annual expenditure on structural maintenance of existing trunk roads has increased by about 50 per cent. in real terms.

In transport, financial support to island shipping services has been increased and a major new investment programme in ships and terminals initiated.

Work has started on electrification of the east coast main line between London and Edinburgh, at a cost of £360 million. The Glasgow-Ayr railway line is being electrified and Glasgow commuter rolling stock modernised, with substantial financial assistance from the Government. Relaxation of licensing on Anglo-Scottish air routes has produced significant benefits for travellers.

In physical planning, measures have been taken to simplify and speed up the planning system. Guidance has been issued specifically with a view to meeting the planning requirements of high technology industries, small businesses and private housebuilders. In the environment, following the 1981 Wildlife and Countryside Act and the 1981 Countryside (Scotland) Act, there has been an increase in resources provided to improve facilities and to conserve the countryside and wildlife habitats. Many sites of special scientific interest have been notified, national nature reserves and national scenic areas designated and regional parks being introduced. Government machinery for the protection, support and care of historic buildings and monuments in Scotland has been reorganised to develop the cultural, economic, recreational, tourist and educational potential of this area of the national heritage.

In housing we have introduced a statutory charter of rights for public sector tenants, including the right to buy. Over 130,000 tenants have applied to purchase their homes and more than 78,000 sales have been completed. Since 1979, 122,000 new homes have been built and the proportion of owner-occupiers has increased from 35 to 40 per cent., with a reduction in the proportion of householders in public housing to below 50 per cent. for the first time for many years. Over 160,000 home improvement grants have been approved and the number of houses below the tolerable standard reduced from 113,000 in March 1980 to 63,000 in 1985. The housing association movement's investment programme has exceeded £100 million in each of the last five years; and the number of bed spaces in sheltered houses for elderly persons has increased from 19·5 per 1,000 in 1980 to 41·5 now. Improvements to the building control system are being made. These will enable projects to start earlier without sacrificing standards or safeguards.

The allocation of functions between regional and district councils has been rationalised in the light of the Stodart report; legislation relating to civic government has been modernised; and the Montgomery report has opened up the way to adjustment of the functions of the Islands councils. Estimating and accounting disciplines have been imposed on Scottish direct labour organisations, which are now required to compete for a significant proportion of their work. Powers have been taken to cut the rates of local authorities planning excessive expenditure and welcome savings have been returned to the ratepayers.

Following the revaluation in 1985, we introduced a quick and effective statutory revaluation rate rebate scheme for those valuations which had increased by more than three times. Proposals have been published for the final abolition of domestic rates in Scotland by 1992 and their replacement by a community charge.

The number of staff employed in the Scottish Office (excluding the prison service) has been reduced by 1,384 (or 13·8 per cent.) and by 1989 staff numbers will be 1,624 (20 per cent.) less than a decade before. The financial management initiative is being implemented vigorously in the Scottish Office with annual management plans, revised to give greater emphasis to objectives and performance, linked to a budgeting system for controlling running costs. Policy reviews are being conducted of all non-departmental public bodies, and financial management surveys of such bodies with executive responsibilities.

Over 900 civil service jobs have been dispersed to west central Scotland and plans are well advanced for the dispersal of more than 1,000 further jobs.

The successful negotiation of a common fisheries policy and improved arrangements for conservation of stocks have provided good opportunities on a long-term basis for the Scottish fishing industry. The Government have taken steps to reduce the incidence of salmon poaching in Scotland in particular by way of the Salmon Bill which is at present going through Parliament. We have supported the hill farming sector through substantially increased aids for livestock producers, enhanced payments to producers within the Highlands and Islands Development Board area and an extension of the less favoured areas to include producers on marginal land.

The Government gave additional emergency aid to over 20,000 livestock producers in recognition of the effect of the bad summer of 1985. The integrated development programme for the Western Isles and approval in principle of proposals for an agricultural development proposal for the other Scottish islands. The introduction of compulsory pasteurisation of milk in Scotland from August 1983 has eliminated outbreaks of milk-borne disease in the general community and the transition from statutory control of milk prices was smoothly accomplished in Scotland during the period 1981-83. We have undertaken a major review of the structure and management of agricultural research and development in Scotland and have introduced changes in the organisation of agricultural education and reviewed agricultural advisory services with a view to improving their efficiency and effectiveness, and to developing a more commercial approach.

EC (Budget)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government will resist any proposals in the various Councils of Ministers which would breach the strict budgetary controls on spending agreed at the Dublin summit.

The Prime Minister: A key objective of Her Majesty's Government when examining new expenditure proposals is that they should be compatible with the budgetary discipline conclusions adopted by the Foreign Affairs Council on 4 December 1984.

"List of Ministerial Responsibilities"

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Prime Minister when an up-to-date issue of the Cabinet Office document called "List of Ministerial Responsibilities", embodying all the Ministerial changes since October 1985, will be available.

The Prime Minister: A new edition of the "List of Ministerial Responsibilities" will be available at the end of this month.

Mr. Harvey Michael Ross

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Prime Minister if she will make representations to the Israeli Prime Minister to deport Mr. Harvey Michael Ross of Leeds to Britain for questioning by the fraud squad.

The Prime Minister: Our arrangements for securing the surrender from Israel of a fugitive criminal charged with or convicted of certain serious offences in this country are governed by the extradition treaty of 1960. I understand that the West Yorkshire police are looking into certain allegations made against Mr. Ross, but that they are not yet in a position to submit a report on the case to the Director of Public Prosecutions for the purpose of obtaining his instructions in the matter.

Bullion Crimes (Israel)

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Prime Minister if she will ask the Israeli Prime Minister to refuse to provide a haven for those suspected of being involved in bullion frauds or gold smuggling in Britain.

The Prime Minister: No. Where a person who is suspected of committing an offence in this country which is extraditable under the terms of the United Kingdom-Israeli extradition treaty of 1960 later flees to Israel, a request for extradition would be made in the usual way under the terms of the treaty.

Research and Development Budget

Mr. Freeson asked the Prime Minister if she will appoint a science Minister to administer the total Government research and development budget.

The Prime Minister: No. I am satisfied with present arrangements.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister how many oral questions were tabled to the Prime Minister on average for each question time in every February from 1978 till the present date.

The Prime Minister: Records in my office show the following estimates:

Date	*Average

1979	56
1980	58
1981	61
1982	67

Special Hospitals (Patient Abuse)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many allegations of cruelty or abuse to patients in special hospitals have been made during the last seven years; and what disciplinary procedures have been taken as a result.

Mr. Whitney: At Rampton hospital, a special police inquiry team was set up in May 1979, following allegations of widespread ill-treatment of patients. The police team, which completed its work in May 1983, investigated more than 1,000 allegations, some of which related to incidents alleged to have occurred several years previously. As a consequence of that investigation, 24 members of the staff of the hospital were charged with one or more offences. Of those, 10 were convicted of one or more offences, three subsequently had their convictions quashed by the Appeal Court and a further five are at present awaiting the hearing of appeals to the House of Lords. Disciplinary procedures have been initiated in all cases of staff still employed at the hospital who were convicted, but that action is in suspense in those cases where the outcome of the appeal is still awaited. Between May 1983 and December 1985, 51 allegations of physical cruelty or abuse were made to the hospital managers. None of those resulted in disciplinary procedures. It is understood that the police also continued to receive allegations during that period, some of which repeated earlier allegations, but none of them resulted in prosecutions.

The position in the other three special hospitals in the seven years 1979 to 1985 was as follows:

Broadmoor Hospital

Seventy-eight allegations of various kinds were made. Following preliminary investigation either to clarify the nature of the allegation or to establish whether there was any supporting evidence or corroboration, 18 of these allegations were investigated more fully. In three of these cases, the patients concerned referred the matter to the police. In 11 other cases, the hospital managers asked the police to investigate and in one of those cases a member of the staff was prosecuted and sentenced to a term of imprisonment. Disciplinary procedures were taken in that case (resulting in dismissal) and in one other case. In addition, two members of staff were formally counselled by their professional superiors.

Moss Side Hospital

There were 55 allegations. Twenty-three of these were referred to the police but there were no prosecutions. Disciplinary procedures were followed in three cases and, in addition, five members of staff were formally counselled by their professional superiors.

Park Lane Hospital

There were 10 allegations, of which six were referred to the police for investigation. No prosecutions or disciplinary procedures resulted.

Nuclear Installations (Cancer)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what evidence he has of additional health hazards to the general public, including the incidence of cancers, in areas near to nuclear power installations; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what assessment he makes of the health hazards to the neighbouring population arising from the existence of nuclear power installations in the United Kingdom on the neighbouring population on the basis of the evidence available to him from statistical returns or other such information on the health of the population.

Mr. Whitney: On the basis of current evidence I am advised that there is no established causal link between nuclear power installations and the incidence of disease in populations near to them. However, there are a number of studies currently in progress into the incidence of cancers in the United Kingdom. These include studies of areas both around and remote from nuclear establishments. The results of these will be considered by the Committee on the Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment as they become available.

The establishment of COMARE was announced by my right hon. and learned Friend on 25 July 1985, at column 771, with the objective of offering Government independent medical and scientific advice on the health effects of natural and man-made radiation in the environment.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which areas of the United Kingdom have the highest incidences of those forms of cancer which have been correlated with atomic radiation; and whether any of these areas are in the immediate vicinity of nuclear power installations.

Mr. Whitney: The information is not immediately available in the form requested, but will be extracted for local authority district areas for 1984. I shall let my hon. Friend have the results as soon as they are available.

Dental Charges

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, further to the answer of 20 December, Official Report, column 420, he will give the average amount of dental charges remitted on form FID, in money terms and the percentage that fell within the following or other convenient ranges of charges (a) £0-£5·99, (b) £6·00-£9·99, (c) £10·00-£14·99, (d) 15·00-£29·99, (e) £30·00-£49·99 and (f) over £50·00.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

War Pensions

Mr. Mates asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the operation of the rules concerning the backdating of claims to war pensions.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will review the commencement date for the war pension award of Mr. Bertram Stevens who was contaminated by mustard gas at Bari harbour, Italy in 1943; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler: In general, yes. However, following representations from the hon. Lady about the case of her constituent, Mr. Bertram Stevens, and also from my hon. Friend, I have undertaken a thorough review of Mr. Stevens' case.

Mr. Stevens was awarded a war pension from 24 November 1983, the date he made his claim. He has contended that he would have claimed sooner if he had been aware of the precise nature of the substance with which he had been contaminated. As a result of my review I have decided, in view of the exceptional circumstances, to backdate his pension to the date after discharge that his symptoms due to the Bari incident first manifested themselves. Full details of the revised award will be notified to Mr. Stevens as soon as possible.

I also propose that the cases of the 600 or so other casualties who were contaminated by mustard gas in the incident should be investigated to see whether similar action is appropriate.

Pensions and Benefits

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will compare retirement and other state pensions and all other welfare and national insurance benefits and allowances paid in November 1979 with those paid in November 1985; and also show the 1985 payments as a percentage of those of 1979.

Mr. Major: The information requested is set out in the following table. May I also take this opportunity to correct a figure in my predecessor's reply to my hon. Friend on 6 February 1985, at columns 595-600. Under item 14 (supplementary benefit) the November 1979 scale rate for a dependent child aged 18 or over was given as £18·95. It should have read £14·65.

★ Amount for family with child under 11. Age-related amounts introduced from November 1985.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of Social Services what is the maximum loss at current benefit rates that will be sustained under the changes proposed in the Social Security Bill by a young person aged under 25 years without children who is (a) not in work and claiming supplementary benefit and (b) in work and claiming housing benefit; under what circumstances these losses will be sustained; and how many people he estimates will be affected to this extent.

Mr. Newton: The variations in claimants' circumstances are such that it is not possible to give a figure of the maximum loss or gain which an individual claimant might experience, or the precise circumstances which might give rise to it. The technical annex published with Cmnd. 9691, however, includes tables which illustrate, on the basis of the assumptions explained in pages 9 to 14 of the annex, the effect of the move to income support on the benefit entitlement of young childless people under 25. The tables show the range of increases and decreases in benefit entitlement, including those whose underlying entitlement would decrease by £5 or more. In the main, these are likely to be the minority of young people in this age group who are householders. Those on benefit at the time of change would receive transitional protection.

The tables in the annex also show the range of increases and decreases in entitlement to housing benefit. Of those young people without children whose underlying entitlement to housing benefit is shown as decreasing, it is estimated that just over half are in work.

Rape Crisis Centres

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will increase the funding of rape crisis centres; and if he will draw up guidelines for the provision of such centres where they do not exist in cities with a population of 50,000 or more persons.

Mr. Whitney: The London rape counselling and research project is the only centre receiving financial support from this Department. This was the first centre of its kind in this country, and it was recognised when our support commenced that some proportion of its work would be given over to national publicity and promotional work in the field of counselling and to the provision of a consultative and advice service to others setting up similar services elsewhere. The grant has been made to support these activities.

Financial support for the local work carried out by this and other centres is a matter to be considered by local authorities, some of whom we understand have already made grants.

The provision of centres in cities where they do not already exist is a matter for local decision and we have no plans to draw up guidelines.

NHS (Cleaning Contracts)

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has regarding the quality of work carried out by private contractors who have secured cleaning contracts for National Health Service buildings.

Mr. Whitney: It is the responsibility of health authorities to monitor the quality of work performed by private contractors.

Child Employees

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will institute an inquiry into the employment of children by parents running small family businesses;

(2) whether he is satisfied that increased Sunday trading will not lead to an increase in the breaches of section 18 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 and the Employment of Children Act 1973; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will list (a) the number of prosecutions and (b) the number of convictions in each of the past three years under section 18 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 and the Employment of Children Act 1973 in respect of the employment of children and young persons below the statutory school-leaving age; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The Government have no plans to change the existing restrictions in the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 and byelaws made under that Act on the employment of children below statutory school leaving age. The Employment of Children Act 1973 has not yet been implemented. We are, however, satisfied that the existing legislation dealing with the employment, education, care and protection of children provides adequate powers to local authorities to safeguard children including those employed by their parents. We do not therefore propose to institute an inquiry. Comprehensive information on the numbers of prosecutions and convictions under section 18 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 is not available centrally in the form requested.

Social Security Reform

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what will be the housing benefit paid to (a) a single person aged under 18 years, (b) a single person aged under 25 years, (c) a single person aged 25 to 59 years, (d) a couple without children where rates and rent are (i) 25 per cent. below average, (ii) average and (iii) 25 per cent. above average and gross weekly income is (1) at the level of unemployment benefit, (2) earnings of £45, (3) £55, (4) £65, (5) £75, (6) £85, (7) £95, (8) £110 and (9) £125 a week under current provisions and under the assumptions set out in the technical annex to Cmnd. 9691; and in each case at what level of income the entitlement to housing benefit would disappear;

(2) what is his estimate of the number of (a) single people aged under 18 years, (b) single people aged under 18 years to 24 years, (c) single people aged 25 years to 59 years and (d) couples where the claimant is aged under 25 years who currently receive some housing benefit; and approximately how many in each category will lose all their housing benefit under the proposals in the Social Security Bill, on the assumptions in the technical annex to Cmnd. 9691;

(3) if he will publish in the Official Report tables similar to tables 8A, 8B, 17A and 17B in the technical annex to Cmnd. 9691 showing the average change in disposable income by family status under the proposals in the Social Security Bill;

(4) if he will publish in the Official Report extra information expanding tables 10A-16B of the technical annex to Cmnd. 9691 showing separately for sick and disabled, lone parents, couples with children in full-time work and not in full-time work, others in full-time work and not in full-time work, and non-pensioners without children who are couples, the numbers losing, gaining and remaining the same, indicating the amount of the change where appropriate who are (a) under 25 years and (b) aged 25 years or more;

(5) what is his estimate of the average amounts paid in (a) water rates, (b) sewerage charges and (c) domestic rates in (i) England, (ii) Wales and (iii) Scotland in 1985-86 by those receiving supplementary benefit which were used in the calculations in the technical annex to Cmnd. 9691.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services under what circumstances, under the assumptions set out in the technical annex to Cmnd. 9691, a single person under the age of 25 years will be better off (a) if they receive income support and (b) if they receive housing benefit but not income support (i) at the point of change and (ii) under the effects of the structural reform, showing separately those circumstances which will result in gains of over £5 a week.

Mr. Newton: The variations in claimants' circumstances are such that it is not possible to give an exhaustive answer, but the main circumstance under which the benefit entitlement of single people under 25 would increase, for both income support and housing benefit, would be if they were entitled to the proposed disability premium. Equally, the entitlement to housing benefit of those with unavoidably high rents might increase. The range of gains, and the numbers involved, are given in the tables contained in the technical annex to Cmnd. 9691.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he has taken to fulfil his undertaking in Cmnd. 9296 that the issues of studying on the dole would receive particular attention; what has been the outcome; and in what form the House will have an opportunity to debate the matter.

Mr. Newton: The Government's wide-ranging review of social security took account of this subject. In our Green and White Papers we put forward proposals for major structural reforms to the social security scheme: matters of detail will require further consideration. The relevant regulations, under the Social Security Bill presently before the House, will be subject to debate in the usual way.

Income Support

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much housing addition will be paid to non-householders in income support.

Mr. Newton: None. As we have made clear, the proposals for income support would end the present distinction between householders and non-householders.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what rate of income support will be due to a couple where (a) one member and (b) both members are aged under 18 years; and what the amounts will be if they have a child or children or if they have responsibilities as a householder.

Mr. Newton: The illustrative rates of benefit set out in the technical annex to Cmnd. 9691 assume a personal allowance of £36·40 for couples where both are aged under 18. If one member is aged 18 or over then the personal allowance would be the same as that for a couple over 18 — £48. In both cases, a family premium would be payable to those with children.

Social Security Bill

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much money has been concentrated on older people by the proposed introduction of a 25 age point in the Social Security Bill; and in what proposed changes this concentration manifests itself.

Mr. Newton: The rates of income support illustrated in the technical annex to Cmnd. 9691 imply some increase in overall expenditure as compared to present rates of supplementary benefit and weekly additions to them. These increases manifest themselves in particular in the position of claimants over 25 in someone else's household. At present the ordinary rate for such claimants is £23·60 on top of which a non-householder's housing addition of £3·90 would be paid. On the assumptions in the illustrative annex such a person would receive £30·60.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give details of his plans for a transition period to avoid difficulties on the introduction of the new provisions contained in the Social Security Bill.

Mr. Newton: The main transitional proposals were set out in the White Paper "Reform of Social Security: Programme for Action" (Cmnd. 9691) published on 16 December 1985. Detailed plans are currently being developed to ensure that the new provisions are introduced as smoothly as possible.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the amount of money which will be lost or gained in (a) the city of Manchester, (b) Greater Manchester and (c) the north-west region as a result of the changes planned for benefits as a result of the Social Security Bill.

Mr. Newton: I regret this information is not available for (a) and (b), and for (c) could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Ophthalmology (Waiting Times)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each health district in the north-west region waiting times for ophthalmology.

Mr. Whitney: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information he seeks. The numbers in the central data sample are too small for reliable estimates to be made below regional level.

The estimated median interval between the date a patient was placed on the waiting list and the date of admission to departments of Ophthalmology in the north-western region in 1983, the latest year for which information is held centrally, was 10 weeks.

The hon. Member may wish to write to the chairman of the North Western regional health authority, who may be able to assist him further.

Pharmaceuticals (Product Licences)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the number of applications (a) he has received and (b) he has granted for parallel product licences for pharmaceuticals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The current position on applications for pharmaceutical product licences (parallel importing) is as follows:

	Number
Applications received	2,500
Applications cleared	1,825
Licences granted	900

The outstanding applications await assessment, but a large proportion of them cannot be determined until information is received from regulatory authorities in other European Community member states.

All applications for product licences (parallel importing) are subject to detailed medical and pharmaceutical assessment and following appropriate inquiries are granted where the licensing authority is satisfied that the imported product is therapeutically equivalent to that which is the subject of the United Kingdom product licence.

The conditions for the grant of PL(PI) licences are set out in Medicines Act leaflet MAL2(PI), a copy of which is in the Library.

Cookers (Single Payments)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what instructions he has issued to local offices of his Department about guidelines issued to claimants of single payments concerning reconditioned and new cookers; if he has expressly forbidden the use of maximum prices in such guidelines; if he will indicate the circumstances under which a single payment would be given for a new cooker; if he will indicate what he considers to be a reasonable distance for claimants to travel to seek suitable reconditioned cookers; and if local offices issue lists of firms which supply reconditioned cookers.

Mr. Major: The matters raised are dealt with in the guidance contained in circular S36/85, a copy of which I sent to the hon. Member under cover of my letter of 11 November 1985. Copies of the circular are also in the Library. I also refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Aldrige-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) on 24 February, at columns 476-78, announcing the reference to the Social Security Advisory Committee for consultation of proposals for changes to the single payment regulations which would, among other changes, introduce a standard sum for cookers.

Pensioners (Payments Overseas)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many British passport holders living in South Africa, New Zealand, Australia and Canada are at present claiming British state pension; and what proportion of them are receiving it at 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984 levels.

Mr. Major: On 31 December 1985 British widows' and retirement pensions were being paid to 19,763 pensioners living in South Africa, 23,672 in New Zealand, 99,129 in Australia and 56,451 in Canada. As entitlement to pension depends on the claimant's national insurance contribution record and not nationality, it is not known how many are British passport holders. The other requested information is not available; it could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Severe Weather Payments

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the £1,700,000 made available in 1985 to supplementary benefit claimants for exceptionally severe weather payments was paid to claimants registered at offices of his Department in the Wolverhampton area; and how many claimants in the same area qualified for such benefit.

Mr. Newton: A total of £20,888 was paid to claimants by the Wolverhampton north and south local offices in 1985, in respect of extra fuel used during a period of exceptionally severe weather. The total number of payments made was 2,224.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what he estimates is the administrative cost for every £1 paid in exceptionally severe weather benefit.

Mr. Newton: We do not have information for this year. Last year some £1·7 million was spent in benefit payments at a further administrative cost of over £1 million.

Sickness Benefit

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people received reduced rate sickness benefit in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and how many of these subsequently obtained invalidity benefit;

(2) what would be the annual cost of paying sickness benefit to anyone who had paid or been credited with contributions on earnings of 25 times the lower earnings limit in the relevant tax year;

(3) what is his estimate of the number of people each year who will fail to qualify for invalidity benefit as a result of the proposal in the Social Security Bill to abolish reduced rate sickness benefit.

Mr. Major: I shall let the right hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Heart Disease

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the cost to the National Health Service of coronary heart disease for the last year to a convenient date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 19 February 1986, c. 205]: It is not possible to estimate the total cost to the National Health Service as a whole of treating coronary heart disease, since data are not available on the proportion of general practitioners' time involved. Hospital costs can, however, be estimated using detailed data from the annual hospital in-patient inquiry returns. From these it is estimated that in 1982 (the latest year for which these returns have been analysed) the cost (revalued to 1984-85 cost levels) was £160 million.

WALES

NHS (Management)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the introduction so far in the National Health Service in Wales of general management consequent upon the Griffiths report.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The introduction of management structures associated with the implementation of general management in the National Health Service in Wales is proceeding satisfactorily. A general manager has been appointed in all district health authorities and at the Welsh Health Common Service Authority. The arrangements for implementing general management at district and unit levels have been approved in all cases following extensive dialogue with authorities. A number of unit general managers have already been appointed. The Executive committee of the Health Policy Board is to monitor structure proposals for the sub unit level.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what initiatives he proposes to strengthen the capability of nurses to participate in the management of health care in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have made it clear to health authorities that their new management structures must provide appropriate channels for the submission of professional advice and further that they should encourage applications for posts in general management from all disciplines, including nurses. Already two nurses have been appointed to unit general manager posts.

The post of chief administrative nursing officer is to be maintained in all health authorities and nurses will also have a recognised and important role to play at unit level.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he takes to ensure that the professional views of midwives in the National Health Service in Wales are considered by senior management; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I recognise that the midwifery profession has an important role in the NHS, and the health authorities are aware of this.

Midwives are members of, for example, the statutory Welsh Nursing and Midwifery Committee, the Welsh National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting which has its own midwifery committee, and of a number of other national committees.

Education (Capital Allocations)

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the capital allocation for voluntary-aided schools in every local authority in Wales (a) in total and (b) as a percentage of the total money made available in Wales by way of capital allocation for education.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The capital allocation for voluntary-aided schools in Wales for 1985-86 was £1,249,000. This is 1·24 per cent. of the total of county capital allocations. These allocations are made under section 72 of the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980. A new system of formula allocations was introduced for 1985-86 and there is no longer an identifiable component for education.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the capital allocation for 1986-87 for wholly-supported schools in the public sector in every local authority in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No specific allocation is made for expenditure on school building within the capital allocations made to local authorities by my right hon. Friend.

Hypothermia

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many deaths from hypothermia have been recorded in Wales since January 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Since January 1985 there have been 63 deaths registered with hypothermia mentioned on the death certificate. This includes cases in which hypothermia was not recorded as the underlying cause of death. The figure is provisional.

North Wales Social Work Practice Centre

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will continue to fund one of the posts at the north Wales social work practice centre at the University College of North Wales, Bangor, after September 1987.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: An announcement regarding grant under section 21 of the Education Act 1980 to non-local education authority bodies will be made shortly.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid Trade Provision Projects

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the aid trade provision projects that have been agreed in the current year's financial provision.

Mr. Raison: So far in the present financial year four agreements involving aid trade provision funds of £4·9 million have been signed. The overall value of British exports associated with these agreements is expected to be £14·1 million. These are:

£ million

In addition, a number of small aid trade provision technical co-operation projects have been signed this financial year.

Since 1 April 1985 ATP support of £188·9 million has been offered for the projects listed in part A of the following table. None of these offers has so far resulted in an ATP agreement being signed. Increased ATP support has also been offered on seven projects on which initial offers had been made before 1 April 1985; these are listed in part B of the table.

Antigua and Barbuda

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any plans to increase the amount of development assistance given to Antigua and Barbuda; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: On the independence of Antigua and Barbuda in 1981, the British Government agreed to provide a capital aid grant of £5 million followed by a £5 million interest free loan. Only £1·43 million of this has so far been committed, but we are prepared to increase the rate of commitment and disbursement with the co-operation of the Government of Antigua and Barbuda. There is also a continuing programme of technical co-operation. Antigua and Barbuda also benefit from a regional grant of £4·5 million agreed in 1985 for the provision of shore facilities for the coastguard services for eastern Caribbean states. I see no need for more aid for the time being.

TRANSPORT

M4 (Service Stations)

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he proposes to offer service station licences on the 50 mile stretch of the M4 west of Hungerford.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There are motorway service areas on M4 at Heston, Membury, Leigh Delamere and Aust. Consultants are examining potential sites for a further service area in the vicinity of Reading.

Commissioners of Irish Lights

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his reply on 27 February, Official Report, column 649, who appoints the Commissioners of Irish Lights.

Mr. Ridley: Under an Act of the Irish Parliament in 1786, as amended by the Dublin Port Act 1867, there may be up to 21 commissioners. One is the holder for the time being of the office of Lord Mayor of Dublin. Three others are aldermen or councillors of Dublin corporation appointed by that body with tenure for its elected life. The remaining commissioners elect new members to their body, for life, when vacancies occur. The Irish Government have a power of disapprobation of these appointments but none to make them. I have no powers of either sort.

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is consulted about appointments to the office of Commissioner of Irish Lights.

Mr. Ridley: No.

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many lighthouses are controlled by the Commissioners of Irish Lights; and how many of these are in United Kingdom territory or waters.

Mr. Ridley: The commissioners directly control the 87 lighthouses that are vested in them, of which 14 are in or off Northern Ireland.

The commissioners, under section 653 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, may also control any of the lighthouses in or off the island of Ireland that are operated by local lighthouse authorities.

Okehampton Bypass

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, in view of the fact that the Government rejected the decision of the Joint Committee on the Okehampton Bypass Special Procedure Order, Her Majesty's Government will now reimburse the objectors to that order who petitioned against it in Parliament the costs they incurred in so doing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: As I advised my hon. Friend recently, the Joint Committee which heard the petitions had powers to award costs, but was not asked to do so.

ENERGY

Electricity Industry (Privatisation)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has commissioned an opinion survey of staff of the electricity supply industry on the subject of privatisation.

Mr. Goodlad: No.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Salmon Poaching

Mr. Steel asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will give the number of cases brought before the courts for salmon poaching in the last 12 months and the number of those which resulted in prosecution.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The relevant figures are not yet available.

Mr. Steel asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will give the number of cases brought before the courts for salmon poaching by means of poisoning in the last 12 months together with the previous three years' figures.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Figures for salmon poaching by poisoning are not separately kept.

EMPLOYMENT

Training and Special Employment Schemes

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General what was the cost of all the Government training schemes and special employment measures for each year from and including the financial year 1972-73; what was the average number of participants in each year; and if he will compare the total expenditure in 1979-80 with that of 1984-85.

Mr. Lang: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to him on 15 January 1985 at columns 76-78. Information for 1984-85 is set out in the table. Expenditure on employment and training measures doubled in real terms between 1979-80 and 1984-85.

YTS

Mr. Wainwright asked the Paymaster General if he is satisfied with the progress being made in the Yorkshire and Humberside region to provide sufficient places under the two-year YTS due to commence on 1 April; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Yes. Already by 11 February 89 per cent. of the required places were definitely or likely to be provided. Approximately 90 per cent. of basic places had been found, and 81 per cent. of premium places, which are designed to help young people and parts of the country with special needs.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Thurnham asked the Paymaster General when the first set of unemployment figures will be published which will include the self-employed in the base formula; and if he will recalculate the overall unemployment percentage figure for January on this basis.

Mr. Lang: It is intended to publish an additional unemployment rate, taking account of the self-employed and the armed forces in the calculation, from next June. Figures cannot at present be calculated retrospectively but a revised series of figures on the new basis will be issued with the new rates.

Sellafield

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Paymaster General if he will place in the Library a full copy of the Sellafield site licence issued by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate.

Mr. Trippier: I have arranged for a copy of the Sellafield site licence to be placed in the Library.

Training Credit Scheme

Mr. Baldry asked the Paymaster General whether, further to the recommendations of the Manpower Services Commission report "A Challenge to Complacency", he will introduce an individual training credit scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: "A Challenge to Complacency" was prepared by consultants at the request of the Manpower Services Commission and the National Economic Development Office. Its suggestions for action are being carefully considered by the commission in consultation with this and other Departments and any decisions on following action will be announced in due course.

Darlington Jobcentre

Mr. Fallon asked the Paymaster General how many people have been placed in jobs through Darlington jobcentre since (a) June 1983 and (b) April 1985.

Mr. Lang: Between 4 June 1983 and 7 February 1986, 9,072 placings were made by the Darlington jobcentre. The corresponding figure for the period 1 April 1985 to 7 February 1986 is 3,124. These figures exclude placings on Government schemes.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Lawler asked the Paymaster General what criteria are used to determine whether a person who has completed a YTS course is immediately allowed on to the enterprise allowance scheme.

Mr. Trippier: All entrants for the enterprise allowance scheme, including those from YTS, have to satisfy all the eligibility conditions of the scheme which include being at least 18 years of age and in receipt of unemployment or supplementary benefit at the time of application. In order to facilitate movement between the YTS and the enterprise allowance scheme, people completing YTS are deemed to have satisfied the 13 weeks (8 weeks from 1 April 1986) unemployment condition.

Factory Inspectors

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Paymaster General if he will publish the number of specialist factory inspectors employed in the field consultancy group in Manchester in December 1979 and December 1985.

Mr. Trippier: On 1 December 1979 there were 14 inspectors in the Manchester field consultancy group. On 1 December 1985 there were 11.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Paymaster General if he will publish the number of factory inspectors actively engaged in inspections in December 1979 and December 1985.

Mr. Trippier: On 1 December 1979 there were 670 factory inspectors working in the field. On 1 December 1985 there were 535. Inspectors based in the field are actively involved in inspection, except the director of each area.

Specialist inspectors working in HSE's seven field consultant groups are also involved in inspection: on 1 December 1979 there were 122 inspectors working in the field consultant groups, and on 1 December 1985 there were 85.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Paymaster General if he will publish the planned figures, as agreed in June 1979, for the number of factory inspectors in the north-west region for each year from 1979 to 1985.

Mr. Trippier: The Health and Safety Executive draws up detailed manpower plans annually for the next financial year. The plans include total numbers of inspectors, but are not broken down by region or area.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Paymaster General if he will give details of planned recruitment of factory innspectors for the north-west region for the year from April 1986-87.

Mr. Trippier: The Health and Safety Executive plan to recruit some 35 factory inspectors during 1986-87. It is not yet known how many will start work in each area.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Durham Prison (H Wing)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are currently in H wing at Durham prison; of these how many are classified as category A prisoners; and for how long each of the women has been at Durham prison.

Mr. Mellor: On 27 February there were 40, of whom one is classified as category A. Nineteen have been at Durham for less than six months; four between six months and a year; seven between a year and 18 months; four between 18 months and two years; and four between two years and three years. One has been there for six years and seven months and one for 11 years and two months.

Fire Service Control Rooms

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the numbers of civilians employed in fire service control rooms in (a) London and (b) Leicestershire and as to the different rates of pay involved for each scale.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number and grades of control room staff in London and Leicestershire fire brigades are:

London (as at 31.7.85)

	Number
Principal Controller	1
Senior Controller	1
Area Controllers	13
Control Officer I	15
Control officer II	25
Control Officer III	117
Assistant Group Officer	1
	173

Leicestershire (as at 1.1.86)

	Number
Group Fire Control Officer	1
Fire Control Officer	1
Senior Fire Control Operators	4
Leading Fire Control Operators	4
Fire Control Operators	9
	19

The current rates of pay of control room staff were promulgated in circulars issued by the national joint council for local authorities' fire brigades (on which the Government are not represented) on 7 November 1985. Copies are in the Library.

These rates do not apply in London. I am making inquiries about control staff salaries in the London fire brigade for which the GLC is responsible and my noble Friend will write to my hon. Friend.

Police Control Rooms

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Leicestershire detailing the number of civilians employed by the Leicestershire constabulary in police control rooms and the different rates of pay involved for each scale.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Police civilians in England and Wales are employed by the police authority or local authority. My right hon. Friend has no responsibility for the pay of police civilians, which is negotiated in the national joint council for local authorities' administrative, professional, technical and clerical services.

Control room work is usually carried out by a combination of police officers and civilians. I understand that there are 62 civilians employed on this work in the Leicestershire constabulary. Their rates of pay range from £5,550 to £6,399 per annum. They also receive a shift disturbance allowance, ranging from 14 per cent. to 20 per cent.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Nuclear Bunkers

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if a bunker connected with Gough barracks, Armagh, features in the Government's contingency plans for the event of actual or threatened nuclear attack;

(2) why the Government have decided that the proposed new nuclear bunkers should not be sited in the area which houses the normal peacetime administration of Northern Ireland;

(3) if he will make a statement outlining the condition of Belfast in the event of a nuclear attack as assessed by Government in their consideration of the plans for the three new bunkers;

(4) if he will make a statement on the proposed arrangements following completion of the three new nuclear bunkers outlining what actual affairs will be managed or monitored from each of the bunkers;

(5) what is the latest estimate for the cost of building the three new nuclear bunkers; what proportion of this is accounted for by security costs; and what is the estimated cost of maintaining the bunkers once they have been built;

(6) what role the civil defence main control building in Mount Eden Park, Belfast, will play in the new arrangements following completion of the three new nuclear bunkers;

(7) when work will begin on the proposed three new nuclear bunkers in Northern Ireland; when it will be completed; and what role the Property Services Agency will have in the development of the three proposed sites;

(8) if he will make a statement outlining the restrictions or vetting to be imposed on the selection of contractors and employees at the sites of the proposed three nuclear bunkers; under what restrictions workers at the sites will operate; and if he will make a statement outlining what type of security measures will be taken around the sites to prevent public access or view.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

DEFENCE

Crown Liability

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has considered excluding Crown liability under section 10 of the 1947 Act only in respect of activities which are peculiar to the armed forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Whilst no option in the review of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947 has yet been closed, attempts over the years to distinguish between activities with a military character and those which are essentially civil in nature have always foundered because of the discrimination it would create between different categories of service men and because it would create more anomalies than it would remove.

Fulbeck Airfield

Mr. Douglas Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Defence when, and on what terms, Fulbeck airfield was originally acquired by the relevant Government Department; and whether he will place a copy of the conveyance and all other deeds and contractual documents in the Library.

Mr. Lee: Fulbeck airfield was originally requisitioned for use in world war two and the Air Ministry later purchased it in eight conveyances between May 1944 and June 1948. These conveyances were of the type normally used for transactions of this sort, and, as such, confidential to seller and buyer; it would not therefore be appropriate for them to be placed in the Library.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state for each region the length of the following categories of road in 1984 (a) motorways, (b) other trunk roads, (c) principal roads and (d) other roads.

Mr. Ancram: The information, as at 1 April 1984, is as follows:

Education (Capital Allowances)

Mr. Steens asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the capital allocation for voluntary-aided schools in every local authority in Scotland (a) in total and (b) as a percentage of the total money available in Scotland by way of capital allocation for education.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The category of voluntary-aided schools does not exist in Scotland.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the capital allocation for 1986-87 for wholly-supported schools in the public sector in every local authority in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Local authorities in Scotland receive a block allocation of consent to incur capital expenditure on schools, further education colleges and community education buildings. Within this overall level of consent they are free to determine which educational building projects will proceed. Information on the level of the block allocations for 1986-87 for each regional and island authority is given in the following table.

Block allocation for education building 1986-87

Regional/Island authority	Cash prices £,000

Road Schemes

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether there are items of information which his Department does not provide on request to objectors to trunk road proposals in Scotland which are provided on request to objectors to trunk road schemes in England and Wales after publication of a line order.

Mr. Ancram [pursuant to his reply, 19 February 1986, c. 189-90]: My understanding is that, broadly speaking, the information provided on request by the Scottish Development Department is very similar to that provided in England and Wales. However, each request is considered individually on its merits, having regard to the cost and the need to prevent unnecessary blight.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Philippines

14. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there will be any change in Her Majesty's Government's relations with the Government of the Philippines following the recent presidential elections there.

Mr. Renton: Our policy towards the new Government of President Aquino was set out in my statement in this House on 26 February at column 945. But I am happy to say again that we look forward to a close and positive working relationship with the new President and her colleagues.

73. Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about policy towards the Government of the Philippines.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to my statement in this House on 26 February at column 945.

European Community

15. Mr. Crowther asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the current priorities of the Government with respect to the European Economic Community.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Our priorities remain as set out in the Queen's speech. The main priority is completion of the internal market, which is the key to creating prosperity and jobs in Europe.

United Nations Relief and Works Agency

16. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what protests he has made to those Arab states who have failed to pay their subscriptions to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency.

Mr. Renton: We have consistently supported resolutions at the United Nations urging all Governments to support the valuable work of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency.

Lebanon (Israeli Action)

17. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to Israel in relation to that country's recent armed incursion into Lebanon.

Mr. Renton: We have repeatedly urged the Israeli Government to implement their stated intention to withdraw all Israeli forces from Lebanon.

Chile

18. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on current relations with Chile.

Mr. Eggar: We have normal diplomatic relations with Chile. But we leave the Chilean Government in no doubt about our concerns over their continuing human rights violations, and our wish to see an orderly restoration of full democracy in Chile. We consider that President Pinochet's rejection, last December, of dialogue with the democratic opposition has done nothing to improve prospects.

71. Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the visits by Ministers or officials in his Department to Chile in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The following Foreign and Commonwealth Office officials have visited Chile in the last 12 months: the head of South America department, a member of research department, and an economic adviser. There have been no ministerial visits.

Disarmament Talks

19. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress in the mutual and balanced force reduction talks.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The response of the Soviet Union and its allies to the recent constructive Western proposal has been disappointing. Instead of matching the significant moves made by Western countries they have returned instead to the inadequate verification proposals which they made almost three years ago. We look to the East to reconsider its position in the light of Mr. Gorbachev's statements that the East is prepared both for reasonable verification and to achieve success at MBFR.

Falkland Islands

20. Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent attempts he has made to resume negotiations with Argentina over the Falkland Islands following the passing of United Nations resolutions in 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Eggar: As I explained to the House on 18 December 1985, we shall continue to seek every opportunity to encourage the Argentine Government to take a more realistic approach and to match our readiness to rebuild confidence. We shall also continue to stand by our commitment to the Falkland Islanders.

68. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement concerning Government policy on fishing within a radius of 200 miles of the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Eggar: We are co-operating fully with the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organisation, which is conducting a technical study of the south west Atlantic fishery. We expect that this will lead on to discussion and agreement on multilateral fisheries conservation and management arrangements. Pending action on the study we have urged all those countries with fishing fleets active in the area to exercise restraint. There has been a generally helpful response.

Syrian Foreign Affairs Minister

21. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the official visit to London of the Foreign Affairs Minister of the Syrian Arab Republic.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Mr. Shara's visit formed part of our continuing political dialogue with Syria. Our talks covered regional and bilateral issues.

European Commission (UK Presidency)

22 Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the priorities which the United Kingdom Government intend to pursue during their six-monthly presidency of the European Economic Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The main task of the next United Kindgom Presidency is the efficient conduct of EC business in the Council of Ministers, During our Presidency our priorities will be:

—to keep up momentum on completion of the Common Market, including transport liberalisation;

—to ease burdens on businesses, and promote flexibility in the labour market;

— to promote continuing reforms in the CAP with a view to reducing agricultural surpluses;

— to work for sound management of the Community budget;

— to secure the launch of a new round of multilateral trade netotiations in the GATT and to conclude negotiations on the renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement;

—to support the Commission in handling trade relations with the US and Japan;

—to ensure that the Twelve member states act together in important matters of foreign policy in the spirit of the new treaty provisions signed in Luxembourg, which were based on a British initiative.

Central America

23 Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has held with the United States Government concerning American foreign policy towards central America.

Mr. Eggar: We regularly discuss all important issues, including the situation in central America, with the United States Government at a number of levels. They are fully aware of our views.

29 Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the European Economic Community Council will next discuss the problems of central America.

Mr. Eggar: As I told the hon. Member on 25 February, there is regular discussion at appropriate levels within the framework of European political co-operation of all important issues including central America. We are in close contact with our European partners over developments in central America and elsewhere.

51 Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent action has been taken by the European Economic Community to help the Contadora peace process in central America.

Mr. Eggar: We and our European partners have consistently expressed our support for the Contadora process. Most recently on 20 January, the Twelve publicly welcomed the impetus given to the Contadora process by the Caraballeda and Guatemala declarations.

Argentine Politicians (UK Visit)

24. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contacts his Department had with the Argentine politicians in their recent visit to the United Kingdom.

27. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his contact with the Argentine parliamentary delegation led by Senor Adolfo Gass during the week beginning 17 February.

Mr. Eggar: In response to an approach from the South Atlantic Council I offered to see the Argentine delegation in the House of Commons. It did not take up the offer.

South Africa

25. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of talks between the South African authorities and the Commonwealth representative group.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Commonwealth Group is comprised of eminent figures who act independently and not as representatives of Governments. We are encouraged by the apparently successful start to their mission, including a preliminary visit to South Africa.

26. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement about the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the current situation in South Africa.

75. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the situation in South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member and my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett).

30. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what Her Majesty's Government intend to do to ensure the release of political prisoners and the end of detention without trial in South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: We have frequently urged the South African Government to release political prisoners without condition and to end the practice of detention without trial. We shall continue to make representations as appropriate.

35. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will expand upon the text of the Lusaka communiqué on South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: We fully subscribe to the Lusaka communiqué which voices unanimous condemnation of apartheid by Ministers of the European Community and Front-Line states and calls for dialogue between representatives of all communities in South Africa.

Israel (North Sea Oil Sales)

28. Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, during the recent visit of the Israeli Premier, he discussed sales of North Sea oil to Israel.

Mr. Renton: Yes. My right hon. and learned Friend told Mr. Peres that there would be no change in our guidelines.

Philippine Ambassador

31. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to meet the ambassador of the Philippines.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to meet the Ambassador of the Philippines. The Philippines Embassy is in charge of the Minister-Counsellor, Mr. Almendrala, with whom the Foreign Office is in close contact.

South African Military Attaches

32. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will arrange for the expulsion of South African military attaches from Britain.

Mrs. Chalker: We agreed with our European partners to withdraw our military attaches from Pretoria and not to grant accreditation to military attaches from South Africa. The question of the continued presence of South African military attaches in London and other EC capitals remains under review.

European Community (Procedural Reform)

33. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the European Economic Community agreement, signed on Monday 17 February, concerning procedural reform; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: We welcome the result of the Danish referendum on 27 February, and the fact that Denmark, Italy and Greece have now signed the Single European Act. The way is now open for member states to start the necessary procedures leading to ratification and implementation.

European Community (Policy Co-ordination)

34. Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in what areas he expects enhanced foreign policy co-ordination between the European Economic Community member states following the passaing of the proposed European Economic Community treaty changes; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The Twelve consult and co-ordinate their views on a wide range of foreign policy issues including the economic and political aspects of security. The new treaty provisions on policital co-operation (which are separate from the changes to the Community treaties also incorporated in the Single European Act) are designed to further this process. The agenda for political co-operation depends on which problems are foremost at the time. I refer the hon. Member to the evidence my right hon. and learned Friend gave to the Foreign Affairs Committee of this House on 11 December. I understand that the Select Committee has placed an uncorrected transcript of the evidence in the Library of the House and that a final version will be published in due course.

Soviet Jewry

36. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, following the release of Anatoly Shcharansky from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, he will now make further representations to the Soviet authorities on behalf of the following Soviet Jews who wish to emigrate, namely; Vladimir Szerah, Victor Brailovsky and Ida Nubel, Josef Begun, Aba Taratuta and Yuli Koscharovsky and Professor Alexander Lerner; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We made clear at the time of Mr. Shcharansky's release that we welcomed this development, for which we had long pressed, and that we hoped it would lead to sympathetic and speedy consideration of other human rights' cases. We shall continue to press the Soviet Union for a general improvement in its human rights performance and for full implementation of its international commitments, including those relating to emigration and family reunification.

Pakistan

37. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about relations with Pakistan.

Mr. Eggar: We have good relations with Pakistan.

El Salvador (Officer Training)

38. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from other countries about the Government's intention to provide military training in the United Kingdom for officer from El Salvador; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: None.

Soviet Union (Human Rights)

39. Mr. Woodall asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in the implementation by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics of the human rights provisions of the Helsinki agreement during the past six months.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles) on 4 March at columns 89-93.

Syrian Foreign Affairs Minister

40. Mr. Campbell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, during the recent visit of the Syrian Foreign Minister, what assurance he received that Syria would hand over to Governments affected any terrorist on their territory.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I mentioned to Mr. Shara' our increasing concern about terrorism and the need for full international co-operation to combat it. I made clear that we are particularly disturbed by continuing reports of Syrian provision of facilities for the Abu Nidhal group.

Palestine Liberation Organisation

41. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the occasions on which official spokesmen for the Palestine Liberation Organisation have declared their acceptance of United Nations resolutions 242 and 338.

44. Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any recent information on the present official attitude of the Palestine Liberation Organisation to United Nations resolutions 242 and 338.

Mr. Renton: Spokesmen of the Palestine Liberation Organisation have on a number of occasions expressed acceptance of all relevant United Nations resolutions but, as King Hussein made clear on 19 February, the PLO declined to accept Security Council resolutions 242 and 338 unconditionally.

African National Congress

42. Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, following meetings between Her Majesty's Government and the African National Congress in various parts of southern Africa, if he will now arrange for formal meetings to be held between the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the African National Congress in Britain.

Mrs. Chalker: There are no plans at present.

49. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to arrange for contact between the African National Congress and United Kingdom Government officials following the recent meeting in Lusaka.

Mrs. Chalker: It is our intention that contacts at official level will continue as appropriate in pursuit of our objective of the suspension of violence and the beginning of peaceful dialogue in South Africa.

60. Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the recent discussions between his officials and the African National Congress in Lusaka, Zambia.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent requests Her Majesty's Government have received for a meeting with the London representatives of the African National Congress; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: There are no present plans for formal meetings.

Soviet Foreign Minister

43. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the visit of the Soviet Foreign Minister, Mr. Shevardnadze, to take place.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Dates for Mr. Shevardnadze's visit have not yet been fixed. I hope that it will be possible to find a mutually convenient time before long.

Anti-ballistic Missile Treaty

45. Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the extension of the anti-ballistic missile treaty.

Mr. Renton: We would like to see the ABM treaty reaffirmed and strengthened.

European Community (Majority Voting)

46. Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate he has made of the increased amount of majority voting in the European Economic Community Council as a result of implementation of the draft European Act.

Mrs. Chalker: We expect that, in future, Council decisions will be taken more frequently by majority voting, both under the large number of existing treaty provisions which allow for this and, in due course, under those provisions amended by the Single European Act. Precise estimates are not possible, since the decision whether to call a vote is one for the presidency of the day.

Libya

47. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about current relations with Libya.

Mr. Renton: As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) on 5 February at column 176, we have at present no plans to resume diplomatic relations with Libya.

Saudi Arabia

48. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations between the United Kingdom and Saudi Arabia.

Mr. Renton: Relations with Saudi Arabia are excellent. My right hon. and learned Friend had a most valuable visit to Saudi Arabia on 13-15 January when he met the King, the Foreign Minister and the Governor of Riyadh. There have been a number of other visits in both directions in recent months, including the parliamentary delegation in which my hon. Friend participated. Further exchanges of visits are expected in the near future.

60. Mr. Welsh asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Saudi Arabian authorities about inhumane punishments and other human rights violations in that country.

Mr. Renton: Appropriate representations are made when particular cases involving individual British citizens arise. This must, however, be seen against the background that the Islamic code of justice and the Saudi system of Government clearly appear to enjoy the adherence and support of the Saudi people as a whole.

Mexico and Venezuela (Debt)

50. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has held with Mexico and Venezuela concerning the impact of lower oil prices on their ability to service their overseas debt; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have expressed our concern about the instability of the oil market and the impact of falling oil prices on the economies of Mexico and Venezuela in the course of our contacts with their Governments. Although we recognise that cheaper oil should in due course benefit the world economy, its immediate impact on the export earnings of major oil exporting debtors such as Mexico and Venezuela cannot fail to be serious.

Nuclear Disarmament

52. Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to respond to Mr. Gorbachev's recent proposals on the reduction and elimination of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Renton: Mr. Gorbachev's proposals of 15 January were conveyed to us in a message to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, who expects to reply soon.

64. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Gorbachev proposals for the reduction and elimination of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister expects to reply to Mr. Gorbachev soon. His proposals contain nothing new in the field of strategic nuclear arms reductions. The Soviet position over intermediate range nuclear missiles has changed; the United States took account of the change in new proposals tabled at the bilateral Geneva negotiations on 24 February. It may be possible to build on Mr. Gorbachev's recognition of the legitimacy of Western concerns over verification.

Nicaragua

53. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current state of United Kingdom bilateral relations with Nicaragua.

Mr. Eggar: We have normal diplomatic relations with Nicaragua.

Latin America (Debt)

54. Mr. Garrett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with Latin American Governments concerning their debt payments.

Mrs. Chalker: The heavy debt burden borne by many Latin American countries continues to cause us concern and this problem is frequently discussed in the course of our contacts with their Governments.

Human Contacts (Conference)

55. Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what matters will be raised by the British delegation at the conference on security and co-operation in Europe meeting of experts on human contacts in Berne, Switzerland in April.

Mr. Renton: We expect to address all items in the mandate for the meeting, which deals, inter alia, with family reunification and contacts, travel, and tourism.

74. Dr. Blackburn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the British delegation to the Berne meeting of experts on human contacts in April under the auspices of the conference on security and co-operation in Europe will raise the subject of the reunification of families.

Mr. Renton: Yes. Reunification of families will be one of the main agenda items at the meeting.

European Commission

56. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will give details of their position at the European Commission session which considers how best to implement the package of measures agreed by the European Economic Community in September 1985; and if Her Majesty's Government will particularly give details on their position regarding the definition of oil.

Mrs. Chalker: We have fully implemented the package of measures concerning South Africa agreed by the member states of the European Community in Luxembourg on 10 September 1985. This package provides for the cessation of oil exports to South Africa. The United Kingdom has no such exports.

Turkey

57. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the European Economic Community Council last discussed Turkey.

72. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the European Economic Community Council last discussed the topic of economic and political relations with Turkey.

Mrs. Chalker: Turkey's relations with the European Community were discussed most recently at the Foreign Affairs Council on 17 February when there was general agreement that work should go ahead on a number of outstanding issues in the framework of the EC—Turkey association agreement, including the unblocking of aid already committed to Turkey, with the aim of holding an early ministerial meeting of the EC — Turkey Association Council.

Middle East

58. Mr. Oakes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what encouragement has been given by Her Majesty's Government to the Syrians to join the peace process in the middle east.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: In my talks with the Syrian Foreign Minister on 3 March I made clear our view that a just and lasting peace in the middle east can only be achieved through a negotiated settlement of the Palestinian problem which allows all the states and peoples of the area to live in security.

South Africa (North Sea Oil)

59. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures are being taken by Her Majesty's Government to ensure that no North Sea oil is reaching South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: We have fully implemented the package of measures concerning South Africa agreed by member states of the European Community in Luxembourg on 10 September 1985. This package proovided inter alia for the cessation of oil exports to South Africa. The United Kingdom has no such exports.

British Council

61. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to meet the chairman of the British Council to discuss the future funding of the council.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has no immediate plans to do so.

Iran-Iraq War

62. Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the latest reports received from Her Majesty's ambassadors about the Iran-Iraq conflict.

Mr. Renton: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) on 24 February at column 448.

Palestine

63. Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which resolutions of the United Nations Security Council and the United Nations General Assembly relating to the question of Palestine Her Majesty's Government accept.

Mr. Renton: The information requested is available in the Library of the House. We continue to support a just and balanced settlement in accordance with Security Council resolutions 242 and 338.

Uganda (Ministerial Visit)

65. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent visit to Uganda by the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker) and on the talks held and the matters discussed.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) on 19 February at column 172.

Nelson Mandela

66. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the European Economic Community Council has asked South Africa to release Mr. Nelson Mandela from prison.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Twelve have consistently called upon the South African Government to release Mr. Mandela, most recently in the declaration on southern Africa which was issued after the meeting of Foreign Ministers of the Twelve in the Hague on 25 February.

European Community (Policy Department)

67. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further proposals he intends to place before his European Community partners for the development of Community policies.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 5 February at column 178.

Strategic Defence Initiative

70. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with his European counterparts about political aspects of the strategic defence initiative; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The US strategic defence initiative research programme comes up from time to time in the discussions my right hon. and learned Friend holds with his European colleagues. We regard it as essential that all implications of strategic defence should be fully discussed and fully taken into account in assessing the outcome of the research programme.

Mr. Adnan Mansour Ghanem

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will raise with the Israeli Government the treatment of Adnan Mansour Ghanem by the Israeli authorities in December 1985.

Mr. Renton: We deplore the Israeli practice of deportation and have made this clear to the Israeli authorities.

Embassy and Consulate Staff

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the cost of financing British diplomats and their staff and the upkeep of British embassies and consulates during the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Eggar: Direct expenditure on the diplomatic service in 1984-85, the latest available year for which complete statistics are available, was £350 million. Of this £214·5 million was directly attributable to the costs of British embassies and consulates overseas.

ENVIRONMENT

Companies (Blacklisting)

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he proposes to take any action to seek to safeguard the right of companies which are blacklisted for political reasons to tender for direct labour work.

Mrs. Rumbold: Local authorities are already required to put most of their buildings and maintenance work out to competition. Any authority indulging in political discrimination in the award of contracts risks successful challenge in the courts.

Written Question (Cost)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the cost of answering the question on local authority rent arrears by the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) Official Report, column 221, 19 February; and why the hon. Member was not referred to published sources available in the Library.

Mr. John Patten: The cost of answering the question was about £50. The information is collected regularly for the Department's own monitoring purposes. It was not possible to refer to published sources in the Library because that information was not, at the time, up to date.

Binswood Hall Playing Fields, Leamington Spa

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why he did not call in Warwickshire county council's planning decision to sell off the Binswood hall playing fields at Leamington Spa for private housing development.

Mr. Tracey: My hon. Friend will be pleased to know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has decided to call in the county council's application for his own determination.

Industrial Technology Park, Warwick

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why he will not call in the planning decision by Warwickshire county council to locate an industrial technology park near to one of the main entrances to the county town of Warwick.

Mr. Tracey: The county council resolved to grant planning permission for the technology park at Heathcote on 9 January 1986. Having earlier decided not to intervene in the matter, it is not now open to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to call in the proposal.

Nature Conservancy Council

Mr. Key aked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information he has as to how many Nature Conservancy Council field staff who are, or who have been, engaged in negotiating management agreements with owner-occupiers in respect of sites of special scientific interest, have had previous practical experience of productive land management or land economics; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what information he has on measures taken to train Nature Conservancy field officers in practical land management and land economics; and if he will make a statement.

(3) what qualifications are sought when recruiting field officers into the Nature Conservancy Council.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am advised by the Nature Conservancy Council that all its field staff are professionally qualified. Assistant regional officers responsible for day-to-day negotiation of management agreements must hold a degree in a science-related subject plus at least two-year post-graduate experience, preferably in a conservation related area. Regional land agents responsible for the substantive negotiation of management agreements are qualified chartered surveyors trained in practical land management and land economics.

In-house training for field staff includes courses in forestry, agriculture and valuations. In addition, they attend relevant external courses organised by professional bodies such as the Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors.

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has made any assessment of the effect on rural employment of constraints placed on otherwise productive operations within sites of special scientific interest; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: No overall assessment can be made easily. The management of such sites in the interests of nature conservation may involve more labour-intensive methods, for example, coppice woodlands or hay-meadows, but in some cases, for example, blanket bogs, less labour might possibly be required.

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of the Nature Conservancy Council's total annual expenditure is devoted to management agreements in respect of sites of special scientific interest in woodlands.

Mrs. Rumbold: For the last completed financial year, the percentage was 1·6 per cent. (excluding staff costs and overheads).

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of the Nature Conservancy Council's total annual expenditure in each of the past three years is devoted to staff and staff support costs; what is the percentage spent on management agreements; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information is:

	1982-83 per cent.	1983-84 per cent.	1984-85 per cent.
Staff and related costs	76	73·5	71·1
Payments under management agreements	2·8	3·5	7·7

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many field officers have been employed by the Nature Conservancy Council in each of the past three years.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information is:

Position at:	Assistant regional officers	Land agents
1 April 1984	82	15
1 April 1985	85	17
Currently in post	126	25

Woodlands

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of woodland sites of special scientific interest include areas of coniferous trees or conifer mix.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Nature Conservancy Council's best estimate is about 15 per cent.

Local Authority Services

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many local authorities have put all or any of their services out to the private sector; how many have selected outside firms to operate work undertaken by former direct labour organisations as opposed to giving in-house organisations the work; and how many have put more than one service into the private sector;

(2) further to the reply to the hon. Member for Barrow and Furness, 29 January, Official Report, column 513, if he will publish in the Official Report that information on costs which he has estimated to accrue from the amount of work going to contractors from local authorities which put contracts out to competitive tender.

Mrs. Rumbold: This information is not collected by the Department of the Environment. The manpower costs in eliciting the information requested would be prohibitive. I can do no better than refer my hon. Friend to my earlier reply on 18 February, at columns 112-13.

Rates

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the average (a) water rates, (b) sewerage charges and (c) domestic rates in (i) England and Wales and (ii) Scotland in 1985-86.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested by the hon. Member is as follows:

Average rates 1985-86	England and Wales £·p	Scotland £·p
(a) Water supply	39·92	26·23
(b) Sewerage and environmental	45·93	*365·97
(c) Domestic	344·00

*The breakdown into separate water, sewerage and domestic rates in England and Wales is not mirrored in Scotland. In addition to the domestic water rate, ratepayers contribute via the regional or general rate to public water, sewerage, coast protection, flood prevention and riverboard requisitions.

Radioactive Materials

Mr. Foreman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the number of Government inspectors who are concerned with the regulation of radioactive materials and their wastes; what were the comparable numbers in December 1983; and if he will give details of the long-term epidemiological monitoring which is necessary to ensure that human health is protected from radiation hazards.

Mr. Waldegrave: The staff levels in 1983 and 1985 are shown in the table:

Inspectorate	1983	1985	Vacancy
MAFF
Fisheries	3	3	1
Food Science Division	*3	4	0
Nuclear Installations Inspectorate	97	99	20
Radiochemical Inspectorate	12	16	1

*One vacancy.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has established a Committee on Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment, which will be reviewing further epidemiological studies to be undertaken in response to recommendation 5 contained in the report of Sir Douglas Black's group which investigated the incidence of cancer in west Cumbria. The Official Report of 21 June 1985, at columns 251-52, gives details of the studies.

Haringey Direct Labour Organisation

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, following his request for a special report on Haringey's DLO, he has reached a decision on that organisation's future.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The special report provided by the London borough of Haringey shows that Haringey's new build direct labour organisation made losses totalling some £5½ million over the period 1981-82 to 1984-85, with a loss in 1984-85 alone of some £3·2 million.

Having considered the report, I have today informed the borough, in accordance with my powers under section 17(5) of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, that with immediate effect its direct labour organisation shall no longer have power to undertake new building work except as necessary to complete work already awarded to it.

Local Government Reform

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any proposals which would reduce the levies of the residuary bodies in the metropolitan areas for 1986-87.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have received representations that steps should be taken to prevent the concentration of staff compensation costs in the first year from falling on the levies. I accept that argument. I have already announced that the residuary bodies may use the balances of the outgoing authorities to make compensation payments in 1986-87. If there are areas where balances alone are insufficient for the purpose, I am prepared to allow the residuary bodies to use the proceeds of the sale of surplus assets. In order that the residuary bodies may be certain that sufficient finance will be available for these payments without recourse to the levy, I will undertake now that if neither balances nor capital receipts suffice I will approve the requisite amount of additional borrowing by the residuary bodies in 1986-87.

Nuclear Installations Inspectorate

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to issue a new publication describing the work of the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate to replace that issued in 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I have been asked to reply.

There are no plans to issue a new publication describing the work of the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate. Much of the information in the existing booklet is still valid.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is yet in a position to give further guidance to local authorities about the recycling of rate support grant in 1986-87 as a result of the latest information on local authority budgets.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In the debate on the RSG settlement in January I provided the House with purely illustrative tables showing the additional grant each authority in England could receive if £400 million of grant was available to be recycled in 1986-87.

On the evidence now available to me about local authority budgets in 1986-87, I am satisfied that there will be a grant underclaim of at least £500 million. I am willing to guarantee that authorities in receipt of grant at budgeted expenditure will receive at least the sums of grant shown in the following table, in addition to their entitlement under the rate support grant settlement, as a result of grant recycling. All prudent authorities will wish to take this into account in reaching their decisions on budgets and rates for 1986-87. I have written to the local authority associations giving them this information.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Outgoers Scheme

Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the arrangements for the outgoers scheme for 1986-87.

Mr. Gummer: The proposal for a Community outgoers scheme is still being considered by the Council of Ministers. It is too early to give any indication of how the scheme, if adopted, would operate, but I am concerned that any such scheme should reflect the interests of all concerned and operate fairly throughout the Community.

The outgoers scheme for England and Wales remains open for the time being.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate the commission has made of the increased production of other commodities if its proposals for a new outgoers scheme for dairy farmers is implemented.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 4 March 1986, c. 89]: In the financial analyses of the proposed Community outgoers scheme and the price fixing proposals, the Commission has estimated that beef production will increase by around 120,000 tonnes in 1986-87. However, it anticipates a fall during subsequent years since there will be fewer calves produced by the dairy herd and therefore fewer adult cattle slaughtered at two to three years.

No quantitative estimate of the effects on other agricultural production is given.

Milk Quotas

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether progress is being made in permitting greater flexibility in the transfer and acquisition of milk quotas.

Mr. Gummer: I attach great importance to obtaining greater flexibility in the transfer of quota between producers. We are actively considering what might be done for the 1986-87 milk year, and we hope to make an announcement shortly.

EC (Food Sales)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent special sales of surplus food and wine have been agreed by the management committee of the EEC; and if he will specify the amounts of food and wine and the sale prices, respectively, expressed in pence per pound.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 27 February 1986, c. 643]: At any one time CAP arrangements provide for a number of schemes to sell intervention stocks. These schemes tend to follow established patterns, but the following recent schemes have distinguishing features:

(i) Beef: Regulation 2670/85 of 23 September 1985

This regulation makes available beef bought into intervention after 31 December 1983, but at least three months before the time it is taken over by the purchaser. Purchase applications must be for a minimum of 40,000 tonnes (bone-in equivalent). Prices are as follows:

	ecu/100 kg	p/lb
Bone-in Beef
Forequarters	108.0	30.3
Hindquarters	200.0	56.1
Boneless Beef
Higher value cuts eligible for export refund	245.0	68·8

Sales are to traders who must export the beef to one of the destinations for which an export refund is fixed. Information on quantities sold is not available.

(ii) Beef: Regulation 2906/85 of 18 October 1985

This regulation makes 39,900 tonnes of beef available for sale for processing within the Community with special provision for reduced prices if the processed beef is used as part of a food aid programme organised by a member state. Prices are:

	If for Food Aid		Other
	ecu/100 kg	p/lb	ecu/100 kg	p/lb
Forequarters	115·0	32·3	153·0	43·5
Hindquarters	65·0	18·2	95·0	26·7

Information on quantities sold is not available.

(iii) Currants: Regulation 352/86 of 18 February 1986

This regulation makes 750 tonnes of 1984 crop currants available for sale for use in sauces and pickles. Prices are as follows:

ecu/100 kg	p/lb
35	9·8

None has yet been sold.

(iv) Butter

The European Commission has proposed the sale of intervention butter at a reduced price to certain countries, including the USSR, India and Pakistan. The butter will be at least 18 months old and the amount of the price reduction will be determined by competitive tender. Normal export refunds will apply. The first invitation to tender under these arrangements closes on 18 March. It is not possible to give any details of quantities or price or to say whether such sales will in fact take place until the results of the tender are known.

Liquid Skimmed Milk

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much liquid skimmed milk was subsidised for use as stockfeed in 1985 to date in the United Kingdom; and what was the cost of the subsidies involved.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 3 March 1986, c. 10: The quantity of subsidised liquid skimmed milk used a stockfeed in the United Kingdom in 1985 was 514·8 million litres for which subsidy payments were £34·5 million. Figures are not yet available covering use during the current year.

EC (Agricultural Expenditure)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total amount of agricultural spending by the EEC which is permitted in terms of the strict budgetary controls agreed at the European Council; and what estimate has been made by the Commission of the likely expenditure in 1986 if its farm prices and other agricultural measures are agreed.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to the reply, 4 March 1986, c. 89]: The financial guideline, which forms part of the Council's conclusions on budget discipline, provides that expenditure relating to agricultural markets shall increase by less than the rate of growth of the own resources base. The guideline for 1986 is 20,619 mecu. This figure was fixed in relation to the Community of 10 member states, and the question of how the guideline calculation should be adopted to take account of the accession of Spain and Portugal is still under consideration by the Council of Finance Ministers.

The Commission has estimated that expenditure in 1986 for the 10 member states under the EAGGF guarantee section (other than fisheries) will be 21,235 mecu if its proposals on prices, related measures and supplementary stock disposals are agreed.

The equivalent figure, including expenditure in Spain and Portugal, is 21,802 mecu.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to inform hon. Members of the detailed proposals in the 1986 farm price review of the EEC before the debate on the subject which is to take place on Monday 10 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 4 March 1986, c. 89]: Four documents containing the bulk of the Commission's detailed proposals were deposited in both Houses on 27 February, and the remaining document on 3 March. My Department has provided the usual explanatory memoranda. All these documents are available in the Vote Office. I am myself meeting the European Legislation Committee today to discuss the Commission's proposals; and I hope that this will put the Committee in a position to report to the House before the debate.

NATIONAL FINANCE

European Community Budget

77. Mr. Deakins asked Chancellor of the Exchequer when the European Economic Community Council will next consider its legal action against the Assembly over the 1986 budget.

Mr. Brooke: The Council lodged its formal application with the Court on 10 February. It will consider the situation again once the European Parliament has taken the next step in the proceedings. The Parliament's defence has to be lodged by 12 March.

Government Departments (Costs)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out the estimated costs of pay, accommodation and other similar services for each central Government Department in 1984-85, in the same manner as in the reply to the hon. Member for Norfolk, North on 2 March 1982, Official Report, columns 112-4.

Mr. MacGregor: The 1984-85 outturn figures are being collected in the form requested, and I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as the information is available.

Car Tax

Mr. Neil Thorne asked Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received regarding the removal of the special 10 per cent. car tax.

Mr. Brooke: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 16 January at columns 1200-1201 to my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey).

Tax Offices (Access)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied with access provisions for disabled employees and taxpayers to tax offices; if there is any action he will be taking to improve such access; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lawson: The Inland Revenue, in conjunction with the Property Services Agency, tries to ensure that all new tax offices have satisfactory access facilities for disabled people and that existing buildings are adapted to meet their needs so far as is practicable. If the right hon. Member has a specific problem in mind, perhaps he would write to me.

EC (Budgetary Controls)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the operation of the strict budgetary controls on European Economic Community spending.

Mr. Brooke: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to him by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 10 February at column 309.

In addition, my reply of 4 March, at columns 95-96, to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) sets out the latest position on the agricultural guideline.

Gold Bullion Market

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set up an inquiry (a) into the operation of the gold bullion market and (b) to seek to ascertain if any staff, directors or shareholders of Johnson Matthey plc or Johnson Matthey Bankers had any knowledge of or gained benefits directly or indirectly by virtue of gold smuggling and bullion frauds since 1980; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: No, since the Government have full confidence that the existing investigations into bullion-related fraud will be effective. The operation of the bullion and gold scrap market was considered in detail in the recent Customs review of the special VAT accounting scheme for gold dealers. As a result of this review, a number of measures to tighten up the scheme were announced on 4 March.

WALES

Welsh Development Agency (Tourism)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the amount of cash given by the Welsh Development Agency to specific tourist-related projects in Wales for each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Welsh Development Agency provides grant aid to tourist-related projects through its land reclamation and environmental improvement activities. The agency has approved the following expenditure on tourist-related land reclamation and environmental improvement projects since 1981:

1981	278,000
1982	2,322,000
1983	2,316,000
1984	183,000
1985	908,000

The agency looks to the Wales tourist board to take the lead in identifying specific tourism development opportunities and is prepared to consider investing in viable tourist-related projects on a commercial basis.

Radioactive Discharges

Dr. John Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all the non-nuclear industrial sites in Wales making authorised discharges of uranium and other radioactive materials to the sea.

Mr. Mark Robinson: There are no non-nuclear industrial sites in Wales in possession of an authorisation to discharge radioactive wastes direct to the sea.

Milk Quotas

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether any milk quota originally allocated to Wales will be transferred to England.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Milk quotas were allocated to individual producers within the England and Wales Milk Marketing Board area.

Transfers of quota between producers are a matter for the parties concerned within the scope of the relevant regulations. There is no evidence of significant cross-border quota transfer between England and Wales.

Welsh Water Authority

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will now publish the figures of the Welsh water authority for (a) the total planned capital expenditure for 1986-87 and (b) the projected internal financial resources available for capital expenditure for 1986-87; and if he will compare both these to corresponding figures for 1985-86.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The Welsh water authority's total planned capital expenditure for 1986-87, as published in the recent Government's public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9702), is £61 million; the projected internal resources are £45 million. The corresponding figures for 1985-86 were £53 million and £33 million respectively.

Welsh Bureau (Brussels)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether his Department has been involved in recent discussions aimed at setting up a Welsh bureau in Brussels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: My Department has not been involved in these discussions. I am satisfied with the Government's arrangements for representing Welsh interests in the Community.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Village Schools

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the number of village schools that have been closed each year since 1979 in Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridgeshire.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is as follows:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986
Norfolk	2	6	7	11	16	12	14	—
Suffolk	—	—	—	—	—	3	—	—
Cambridgeshire	—	1	7	7	1	2	5	—

Students

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the number of students who have entered full-time undergraduate and post-graduate courses at universities or polytechnics in each academic year since 1978-79.

Mr. Walden: First year student numbers on first degree and postgraduate courses in Great Britain were as follows:

(Thousands)

	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Postgraduate students	40·4	40·5	40·4	42·2	40·1	42·4	43·6
First degree students	123·1	127·0	129·3	134·9	135·3	132·1	133·8

Annual Report

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received in respect of the annual report to Parliament by holders of his office; and how many of these advocated discontinuance of the report.

Sir Keith Joseph: I am not aware of any such representations.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the cost of his annual report to Parliament in each of the last three years; and how many copies of the report were produced in each year.

Sir Keith Joseph: The main cost to the Department arises from the time spent by officials in preparing the report and is estimated to amount to over £15,000 each year. The number of copies printed in each of the last three years is as follows:

Annual report	Published	Total number of copies printed by HMSO
1982	1983	2,000
1983	1984	1,800
1984	1985	1,700

Education Standards

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what evidence he has to indicate that higher education standards need to be raised, as stated in paragraph 1.7 of the Green Paper.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend regards it as axiomatic that all educational institutions should at all times seek to pursue higher standards. Concern for the maintenance and enhancement of standards is reflected in various ways in the volumes published as part of the Leverhulme programme of study into the future of higher education, in the advice on future strategy for higher education published by the University Grants Committee and by the National Advisory Body for Local Authority Higher Education (now the National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher Education) in September 1984, in the report "Academic Validation in Public Sector Higher Education" (Cmnd 9501) and in the work of the group established by the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals on the maintenance and monitoring of academic quality and standards.

Education and Employment

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recommendations were submitted to him by the University Grants Committee in respect of links between higher education and employment before publication of the Green Paper.

Mr. Walden: The advice of the University Grants Committee to my right hon. Friend is set out in "A Strategy for Higher Education into the 1990s" published in September 1984, and in particular in section 3 of that report.

Assisted Places

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list the four schools which have been given dispensation from the 60 per cent. requirement for the assisted places scheme in academic year 1985-86.

Mr. Dunn: The information is as follows:

Epsom College
Leeds Girls' High School
St. Peter's School, York
St. Swinthun's School, Winchester

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) of 25 February Official Report, columns 509-11, if he will state the figure taken as the Inner London education authority secondary education unit cost; and if he will state the basis of that figure.

Mr. Dunn: The fee levels at assisted places schools were compared with an Inner London education authority secondary schools unit cost of £1,760 for 1983-84. This unit cost includes expenditure on the salaries and wages of all the staff employed in schools except on the preparation of school meals, and on most of the supplies and services provided to schools. It does not include the cost of school meals, central administration and inspection or debt charges.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) of 25 February, Official Report, columns 509-11, if he will state the value in respect of each of the listed assisted places schools of (a) charitable status, (b) rate relief, (c) value added tax concessions on school fees and (d) uniform, travel and school meal allowances.

Mr. Dunn: Information is not available as regards parts (a), (b) and (c). On (d), for the school year 1984-85, average payments per pupil were £65.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) of 25 February, Official Report, columns 509-11, what information is available to his Department as to the social and academic intakes of the assisted places schools and the Inner London education authority schools, respectively; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Information in respect of individual pupils taking part in the assisted places scheme is not collected by the Department.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) of 25 February, Official Report, columns 509-11, what information he has as to the level of parental contributions made to the assisted places schools and the Inner London education authority schools concerned, respectively; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Detailed information on individual parental contributions is not available. The average parental contribution for the school year 1984-85 was £333. The fee levels in the cited answer took no account of any remission under the assisted places schemes.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) of 25 February, Official Report, columns 509-11, how far the fee levels for the listed assisted places schools take into account charitable status and tax concessions on school fees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is not available centrally.

Governing Bodies

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will now take steps to collect information in respect of those local authorities where people under the age of 18 years are permitted full governor status on governing bodies of educational institutions; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: There is no evident reason to collect information on present practice. In the Government's view, a school or college governorship is an office of public and pecuniary trust and thus may not be properly held by a minor. The Education Bill currently before Parliament proposes to put the matter beyond doubt.

School Costs, Intake and Achievement

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if any research is currently being funded by his Department into the differences in school costs, intake and achievement of pupils in selective and non-selective secondary schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The Department is not currently funding research which considers the differences in these respects between selective and non-selective schools. However, as my right hon. Friend announced in the House on 14 November 1984, at column 697, he is considering a number of proposals for wider ranging research into the factors affecting performance in schools including the organisation of the schools, along with other factors.

ENERGY

NEI Peebles Ltd

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has received recent representations from NEI Peebles Ltd about the electricity supply industry's ordering programme.

Mr. Goodlad: No. However I understand that this company and other transformer manufacturers have proposed in the NEDO heavy electrical machinery group, an accelerated transformer replacement programme to reduce electrical transmission losses in the public supply system. This proposal has been considered by the electricity supply industry not to be economically justified.

Radioactive Material

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Energy at what stage the nuclear installations inspectorate is in preparing preconstruction licensing procedures for Land 2 disposal facilities.

Mr. Goodlad: The nuclear installations inspectorate of the Health and Safety Executive is in the process of preparing preconstruction licensing procedures for shallow land facilities for the disposal of radioactive waste.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Energy if the nuclear installations inspectorate has set down requirements for the design, commissioning, safety and operation of Land 2 disposal facilities.

Mr. Goodlad: The requirements for setting up and operating waste disposal facilities will, as with other nuclear installations, be formulated in the conditions attached to the nuclear site licence. These conditions, which will be on the same lines as those attached to existing nuclear site licences are in the course of development within the NII.

Electricity Prices

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list, per kWh at January 1986 prices, the estimated cost of electricity to be purchased from Electricite de France, and that produced at Hinckley B advanced gas-cooled reactor.

Mr. Goodlad: Information for Hinkley B AGR was published in the Central Electricity Generating Board's booklet "Analysis of Generation Costs 1983-84 Update". This showed costs ranging between 1·5p/kWh and 2·64p/kWh depending on the method of calculation. I shall arrange for the CEGB to write to my hon. Friend giving figures adjusted to March 1986 price levels.

Details of the CEGB's purchases of electricity from Electricite de France are commercially confidential but the board has stated that EdF will provide a commercial supply of electricity to the CEGB for two years at a cost of up to 25 per cent. cheaper than could be generated on average in the United Kingdom.

Oil Production

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to the oil production in million barrels per day for the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries in the years 1978, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Production of oil by members of OPEC is estimated by British Petroleum to have been as follows:

	Million barrels per day
1978	30·3
1979	31·5
1980	27·5

	Million barrels per day
1981	23·4
1982	19·9
1983	18·5
1984	18·3

Source: BP 1985 Statistical Review of World Energy.
Note: Production includes crude oil, shale oil, oil sands and Natural Gas Liquids.

No figures have yet been published for 1985. This publication is in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to how many barrels per day on average each individual Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries member country produced for the years 1978, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Information about individual OPEC countries' oil production is available from a number of sources; one which is readily available is the 1985 "BP Statistical Review of World Energy", page 5. Further information about crude oil production — ie excluding NGL's and some condensates — can be obtained from the OPEC Annual Statistical Bulletin for 1984. Both publications are in the House of Commons Library. Data for 1985 is not yet published.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many barrels of oil were produced per day from the North sea for the years 1978, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Average United Kingdom production of crude oil and NGL's for the years requested is shown below. The figures are taken from the Brown Book, coverted to millions of barrels per day. 1985 total is provisional:

	Millions of barrels per day
1978	1·11
1979	1·60
1980	1·66
1981	1·84
1982	2·14
1983	2·38
1984	2·61
1985	2·66

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what were the average prices of North sea crude oil for the years 1978, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Average price of North sea crude oil expressed as dollars per barrel:

	Dollars per barrel
1978	13·8
1979	19·8
1980	30·0
1981	33·8
1982	32·6
1983	29·5
1984	28·3
1985	28·2

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to meet Sheikh Yamani, the Saudi Arabian Oil Minister, in the near future, to discuss oil prices and production levels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: No; and no.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the representatives of oil producers in the United Kingdom to discuss oil prices and North sea oil production levels.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I frequently meet United Kingdom oil producers, both individually and as represented by the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association and the Association of British Independent Exploration Companies to discuss matters of mutual interest.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much in total has been invested in North sea oil production since 1964.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Total investment in North sea oil and gas in the prices then ruling, together with exploration expenditure, between 1965 and 1985 inclusive was £36 billion.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the number of new oilfields which have been opened since 1978 in the North sea.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Since the end of 1978, 18 new oilfields have commenced production in the United Kingdom sector of the North sea. A further nine fields have been approved and are now being developed but are not yet in production.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many new oilfields are anticipated to be opened, annually, in the years 1986, 1987 and 1988.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: There are six new offshore oilfields and one condensate field which have been approved and which are currently scheduled to begin production before the end of 1988. Of these, two should produce their first oil in 1987, and five in 1988. In addition, a number of other fields are expected to come forward for approval, but it is not possible to say at present whether any of these will be producing by the end of 1988.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has about the projected level of investments in North sea oil production for the years 1986, 1987 and 1988.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The latest forecast produced by the industry of investment in North sea oil and gas production in 1986, 1987 and 1988 was published in the 20th report of the Process Plant Economic Development Committee in August 1985. The figures are:

£ million (fourth quarter 1984 prices)

	1986	1987	1988
Low estimate	2,836	1,405	717
High estimate	4,129	4,037	3,470

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many workers are employed in North sea oil production (a) on rigs, (b) in refineries and (c) in module yards.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The latest estimates available are for September 1985, when some 29,000 people were employed on installations on the United Kingdom continental shelf, including construction workers and personnel on mobile drilling rigs, service vessels, support barges and survey teams; some 20,700 in the United Kingdom refining industry, and about 10,000 people in module yards.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will state the sterling value of oil exports for the years 1984, 1985 and the expected value for 1986.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The sterling value of oil exports for 1984 and 1985:

	£ million
1984	14,852
1985	16,050

Source: Current Account of the UK Balance of Payments Press Notice 26 February 1986.

Net oil exports for the above years were £6·9 billion and £8·2 billion respectively. Forecasts of export value for 1986 are not available.

Oil Policy

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his policy on oil in the light of current and projected price trends; and what discussions he has held with oil companies about the price implications of this policy.

Mr. Peter Walker: United Kingdom oil production levels are a matter for the producing companies, subject only to technical limits. United Kingdom prices are determined by the world market and the balance of supply and demand. I frequently meet the oil companies to discuss matters of mutual interest.

Gas

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about gas imports and exports and the development of the gas resources of the United Kingdom continental shelf, following the privatisation of the British Gas Corporation.

Mr. Peter Walker: Gas imports and exports can have a major effect on the rate and pattern of the development of UKCS resources, and hence on wider national interest. The Government intend to ensure that this interest is adequately protected and that continuing gas supplies are available to customers in this country. Substantial gas resources are available, or potentially available, both from the UKCS and from overseas sources to enable the new company to meet the needs of its customers for many years ahead. The company will be able to import gas subject to the normal consent requirement for the laying of pipelines across the UKCS and, in appropriate cases, the conclusion of intergovernmental treaties. In addition, Sir Denis Rooke has assured me that the new gas company will consult the Government regarding its import plans as these develop.

There are at present only limited opportunities to sell new gas into Continental markets and access to these markets may add little in the short term to the boost which the Government's policies have already given to UKCS exploration and development. The Government are prepared, nonetheless, to consider applications for waivers on the landing requirement on a case-by-case basis. In doing this, it will take into account considerations relating to the security of the UK's gas supplies without any presumption that exports should not take place in present circumstances.

The Government remain firmly committed to maintaining the pace of UKCS development and intend to ensure, as they have since 1979, that adequate market incentives exist for the exploration, appraisal and development of new gas. There will be no question of the new company discriminating against indigenous gas supplies; or of UKCS gas producers putting at risk this country's security of supply. The Government will keep close watch on terms of trade between suppliers and the new company and will stand ready to act as necessary.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Financial Services Bill (Lord Chancellor)

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Attorney-General if the Lord Chancellor is to divest himself of his interest as a name at Lloyd's before the Financial Services Bill reaches the House of Lords for consideration.

The Attorney-General: No.

Mr. Mohen Nikbakht

Mr. Dickens asked the Attorney-General if he will initiate a prosecution of Mr. Mohen Nikbakht of Greater Manchester for having intercourse with a girl under the age of 16 years, namely, Elham Bahrami; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I understand that the Greater Manchester police are making inquiries into the matter to which the hon. Member refers and will be submitting a report to the Director of Public Prosecutions. The question of criminal proceedings will be considered at that stage.

PRIME MINISTER

European Community (Food Exports)

Q62. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister when the European Council last discussed the resources devoted from Common Market funds to the export of cheap food to the Soviet Union and east Europe; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The European Council has not discussed this as a specific topic, at least in recent years.

Mr. Gallagher Daggitt

Q73. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if, pursuant to her reply of 18 December, Official Report, column 160, she will clarify the role of Mr. Gallagher Daggitt of the Department of Education and Science in the strategic defence initiative participation office.

The Prime Minister: Mr. Gallagher Daggitt, who has been seconded to the strategic defence initiative participation office in the Ministry of Defence, has special responsibilities within the office for explaining to higher education institutions and the research councils the opportunities for their participation in the United States strategic defence initiative research programme; and for liaising between the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Education and Science on strategic defence initiative matters.

Family Assistance

Q107. Mr. Rathbone asked the Prime Minister how the activities of the Treasury and the Department of Health and Social Security are being co-ordinated to help families.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) on 24 February at column 409. As he will see, the examples of co-ordination between the Government's fiscal and social security policies listed there are of particular relevance to families.

Merchant Fleet

Q114. Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister what steps she intends to take to seek to reverse the decline in the British merchant fleet.

The Prime Minister: Many of the factors that have led to the reduction in the British merchant fleet over the last decade are outside the control of either the industry or the Government. We are, of course, doing all that we can in international negotiations to create conditions that will give opportunities to British ships and encourage United Kingdom ownership of vessels, preferably under the British flag. At home we are working to reduce the burden of costs and marine regulations.

Social Policy

Mr. Galley asked the Prime Minister if she will list the main achievements of her Government in social policy.

The Prime Minister: This Government have ensured the continued development and improvement of the National Health Service. We have increased spending on the NHS by 21 per cent. in real terms, and taken steps to ensure better value for money from the resources available. More emphasis has been placed on the prevention of health and social problems.

As a result there have been considerable increases in services to patients. In England alone, comparing 1984 and 1978, there were:

—over 750,000 more in-patient cases;
—over 660,000 more day cases;
—over 3 million more out-patient attendances;
—over 750,000 more people treated by district nurses or visited at home by health visitors;
—more than double the number of patients being treated for chronic renal failure;
—over 1,750,000 extra sight tests;
—over 3,750,000 more courses of dental treatment.

The perinatal mortality rate has dropped from 15·4 in 1978 to 10·0 in 1984.

There are many thousands more doctors and nurses working in the Health Service. A major programme of capital investment is under way to restore the damage done by the 35 per cent. cut in capital spending under the previous Government. Capital spending increased from £365 million in 1978-79 to £793 million in 1984-85. In the years 1980-85, 35 major schemes, each worth more than £5 million, were completed. Almost 150 more hospital schemes — worth over £1,100 million — are currently being planned, designed or built.

In order to ensure continued improvements in services to the public, general managers have been appointed by all regional and district health authorities, and many units. Benefits for patients from the cost-improvement programmes put into effect by health authorities are expected to reach £150 million in the current year alone.

In the field of personal social services we have set up the Social Service Inspectorate. The inspectorate's work programme includes the inspection of home help services, community services for mentally ill people and social services for the care of children at risk of abuse. There have been significant improvements in provision. For example, the number of places in day centres for the elderly rose by over 20 per cent. between 1978 and 1984 and there was a 13 per cent. increase in the numbers of home helps.

In the social security field, the Government have maintained the protection of social security benefits against inflation. The uprating to be made in July 1986 will add a further £410 million to social security spending in a full year and take total spending to almost £43 billion in 1986-87. The retirement pension has been raised ahead of prices since 1979 and is being paid to more pensioners than ever before. Help with heating costs has been raised by around £140 million in real terms above the levels of support given in 1978-79. Spending on sick and disabled people has also gone up, by 30 per cent. in real terms over the last five years. At the same time inflation, which led to price increases of over 110 per cent. under the last Labour Government, has been brought under control. That is greatly to the advantage of pensioners and all those on fixed and low incomes.

We have completed the most fundamental and far reaching review of social security carried out since the war. This is now the subject of legislation before the House. Our proposals set out a programme for a modern system of social security that will be simpler to run and to understand; that will give new rights and new opportunities in pensions in addition to the reforms in the Social Security Act 1985; that will improve incentives to save and to earn more; and that will concentrate more help on those who need help most, notably low-income families with children.

We have introduced a range of measures to help the unemployed, particularly those who have been out of work for some time. The expanding community programme will provide 230,000 places this year for some 300,000 long-term unemployed people on projects of value to the community. The enterprise allowance scheme has so far helped 125,000 unemployed people to start their own business. We are developing new measures to help the long-term unemployed. A new job start allowance coupled with a special programme of counselling assistance to find a job or training is being piloted in nine areas. We are establishing a network of job clubs to help people help themselves get back to work. Overall we will be spending some £1,350 million on carefully designed, cost-effective employment measures in 1986-87.

Our principal concern in education has been to raise standards at all ability levels and to obtain better value for money throughout the education system. We have put great emphasis on the need for a closer relationship between the education service and the outside world, particularly industry and commerce.

In schools, this has involved pursuing the objectives set out in the White Paper "Better Schools", in particular defining with greater clarity the objectives and content of the curriculum; financial support for a pilot initiative to promote technical and vocational education for 14 to 18-year-olds in schools and colleges; the support of a pilot programme for improving the education of lower attaining pupils.

Decisions have been taken to introduce a new system of examinations at 16, the General Certificate of Secondary Education, based on national criteria; to introduce the AS-level examination to broaden A-level studies; and to introduce, and to develop through specially financed pilot projects, records of achievement for all school leavers.

The Education Bill, now before Parliament, will reform school government, giving more influence to parents.

The Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education has been set up to review and evaluate initial teacher training courses and a programme of in-service training grants for school teachers; the Education Bill will make provision for new financial arrangements to make in-service training more effective.

More has been spent per pupil than ever before (a 16 per cent. increase in real terms in the four years to 1983-84) and the best ever overall pupil-teacher ratio of 17·8:1 has been achieved.

Education support grants to target resources on activities of particular current importance have been introduced and reports of formal inspections by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of individual schools and colleges are now published.

Positive and practical policies for meeting the widely varying needs of young people have been implemented through the work of the recently established National Advisory Council for the Youth Service.

A programme of in-service training grants for further education lecturers has been established, together with a range of measures aimed at increasing the responsiveness of the further education sector to the needs of employers. These include: the establishment of college-employer links projects; the introduction of the new certificate of pre-vocational education involving in its first year over 1,000 schools and colleges and over 15,000 students; the reassessment of the system through the review of vocational qualifications; and the encouragement of consultancy work.

A Green Paper on the future of higher education has been issued.

The number of home students in higher education has increased, including a 30 per cent. increase in the numbers on science and engineering courses. This reflects a 15 per cent. growth in the proportion of 18 to 19-year-olds entering higher education and an increase of 12 per cent. in the number of mature entrants. At the same time, measures to preserve and enhance quality, and to increase the cost-effectiveness of the system and its responsiveness to the needs of the economy, have been pursued.

The planned continuation of the significant shift towards science and engineering and other vocational subjects has taken place, with the industry itself contributing £24 million towards institutions included in the engineering and technology programme. Specific measures to link higher education and industry in collaborative projects include the appointment of more industrialists to educational bodies.

There has been a range of initiatives aimed at increasing the responsiveness of higher education to the needs of people needing updating and of the unemployed through the PICKUP and REPLAN programmes respectively. The PICKUP programme is helping to secure an increase in updating education of about 10 per cent. a year, especially in the areas of technology and business studies.

This Government introduced the first ever statutory charter of rights for public sector tenants, including the right to buy their homes. The number of owner-occupied dwellings has increased by 2·25 million in Great Britain since 1979 and owner-occupation is now 62 per cent.; the proportion of young people owning their own homes is now the highest in Europe. Home improvement grants have been made more widely available than ever before. Assistance has been given to the owners of defective houses previously in the puplic sector, and an urban housing renewal unit has been set up to help authorities tackle the problems of their rundown estates. Measures have been introduced to encourage lettings in the private sector.

We have given a new priority to crime prevention activity. We have encouraged a wide range of initiatives involving the police and the community. These initiatives have been supported through a crime prevention unit at the Home Office, through a standing conference on crime prevention, and most recently through a seminar which I chaired at No. 10. The active involvement of all concerned in practical measures to prevent crime is proving an effective way to deal with a wide range of criminal activity, as well as strengthening the relationship between the police and the community.

We have also ensured that adequate resources are devoted to fighting crime. Total manpower (police and civilians) in the police service has increased by over 17,000 since 1979. Total expenditure on the police service in England and Wales has increased from £1·1 billion in 1978-79 to £2·8 billion in 1985-86—an increase of one third in real terms. In addition, we have established a new framework for police powers and for handling complaints against the police, in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

Since 1979 the prison service has been expanded by the recruitment of nearly 3,000 officers, and we have continued the major programme of new prison building and refurbishment of the existing prison estate. Under this programme some 2,000 new inmate places have been created since 1983 and a further 15 prisons are under construction or planned. At the same time, we have been taking steps to improve management and efficiency within the prison service and in particular to forge better lines of communication and accountability.

The Government have developed a comprehensive plan for tackling drug misuse. An information and education campaign has been launched; its outcome will be carefully monitored. Action is being taken to reduce supplies of illicit drugs from abroad; enforcement by Customs and the police has been strengthened. New powers to deter drug traffickers (including measures to confiscate their illicit proceeds) are being taken, and rehabilitation services are being expanded.

We have enabled local authorities to control the spread of sex shops and sex cinemas. We have also given assistance with measures designed to restrict indecent displays, extend licensing controls to commercial cinema clubs, and establish a system of classification for video recordings aimed at dealing with the problem of "video nasties". In addition, we have supported legislation to penalise kerb crawling.

We have enacted legislation to deal with drunkenness at designated sporting events. Legislation has also been passed for data protection; to provide for the fourth television channel and for the Welsh fourth channel; to provide for the development of direct broadcasting by satellite and for cable television; and arrangements are being made for an experiment in community radio. We have given the franchise to many British citizens abroad and have extended absent voting rights to holidaymakers.

We have given firm support to the voluntary sector. Between 1979-80 and 1984-85 the level of Government grants given to voluntary bodies has risen in real terms by over 50 per cent.

We have operated a firm but fair immigration control, under which the number of immigrants accepted for settlement has fallen to the lowest figure since controls were first imposed on Commonwealth citizens in 1962.

We have taken steps to reduce the pollution of our rivers, estuaries and beaches. The Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 was the first piece of major countryside legislation for more than a decade, and represents a significant step forward in the protection of landscape, flora and fauna. We have also taken the initiative in Europe in removing lead from petrol and paint, and we are steadily eradicating it from those water supplies where it is still a problem.

The derelict land programme has been greatly increased. Urban development corporations have been established in London docklands and on Merseyside to bring about the redevelopment of these areas. Twenty-five enterprise zones have been designated. In addition, we are spending substantial sums through various Government programmes on improving conditions in our inner cities. City action teams were established last year to bring together more effectively central Government action in the seven inner city partnership areas. New task forces are being established for eight small inner city areas with particular problems to target more effectively the help that is already being given and to try out new approaches, for which an additional £8 million has been provided. All these measures are having a marked impact on older urban areas in need of regeneration.

Salaries

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Prime Minister what has been the average yearly salary increase to teachers, police and the armed forces since June 1979.

Ministers of State (Status)

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Prime Minister if the definition of the status of Ministers of State in relation to the respective departmental Ministers, as given by the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker), Official Report, 13 December, column 1210, applies to all Ministers of State.

The Prime Minister: What my hon. Friend said on 13 December did not and was not intended to imply any change in the status of a Minister of State.

President Aquino

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's relations with the new Government of President Aquino of the Philippines.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) on 5 March, at column 174, and to the statement on the Philippines by my hon. Friend on 26 February at column 945. Her Majesty's ambassador in Manila, Mr. McLaren, called on Mrs. Aquino on 27 February to convey my congratulations on her becoming President.

Engagements

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 6 March.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 6 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with the National Pensioners Convention.

THE ARTS

Philharmonic Orchestra and Hall (Liverpool)

Mr. Hind asked the Minister for the Arts if he will give details of the latest proposals for financing the Liverpool philharmonic hall and Royal Liverpool philharmonic orchestra through the Arts Council and Arts and Libraries Office.

Mr. Luce: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 25 February 1986, at column 479. The additional grant of £137,500 which the Arts Council will make available to the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Society will come from the £25 million in post-abolition funding which the Government are providing for the council.

News International Newspapers

Mr. Cartwright asked the Minister for the Arts, further to his reply to the hon. Member for Woolwich on 24 February, Official Report, column 413, what would be the cost of sending a letter to each of the library authorities in England requiring them under the Public Libraries and Museums Act 1964 to provide information as to the imposition of a ban on News International newspapers in their public libraries.

Mr. Luce: It appears that only a small minority of library authorities are applying a ban. To circulate all authorities would be a disproportionate response at this stage. I hope that the authorities concerned will take account of the views which both the Government and the Library Association have expressed, and end the ban quickly.

Export of Works of Art

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts whether the total amount of tax satisfied referred to in his answer of 26 February, Official Report, column 593, included the outstanding balance of £167,786 in respect of the Geoffrey Keynes collection.

Mr. Luce: The previous answer of 26 February referred to objects and property accepted since 2 April 1985. It did not, therefore, include the balance relating to the Geoffrey Keynes collection. This has, however, been paid from the sums available in the current financial year as indicated in the answer given to the hon. Member on 2 April 1985.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing Benefit (Rates)

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what figures are available to indicate the total amount of rates paid through housing benefit on each district in Northern Ireland in each of the past two years.

Mr. Needham: A breakdown of expenditure by district is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, the total amounts (rounded) of rates rebates paid under the housing benefits scheme in 1984-85 was £20,086,000 and the estimated expenditure for 1985-86 is £22,665,000.

Claimant Statistics

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what figures are available to indicate the number claiming supplementary benefit at each social security office in Northern Ireland; and what further figures are available to indicate the total number of dependants on those claimants.

Mr. Needham: The numbers claiming supplementary benefit at each social security office in Northern Ireland at 19 November 1985, the latest available date, are as set out. Information is not available to indicate the total numbers of dependants on those claimants.

Mr. Needham: The numbers of people receiving housing benefit and supplementary benefit, including housing benefit supplement, in each district council area in Northern Ireland at 7 February 1986 are shown in the table. Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total number of appeals in 1985 relating to single payments under supplementary benefit regulations in each social security office in Northern Ireland; and what information is available to indicate how many appeals succeeded at review stage, at tribunal or at the commissioner.

Mr. Needham: Social security benefit appeals are heard at 21 centres throughout Northern Ireland, not at each social security office. The total number of appeals in 1985 relating to single payments under supplementary benefit regulations and the numbers of these which were successful at review stage and at tribunal are as set out:

Claimants (Appeals)

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what figures are available to indicate the number of claimants who had representation at appeal tribunals in each social security office area in Northern Ireland in 1985.

Mr. Needham: Security appeal tribunals sit at 21 centres throughout Northern Ireland, not at each social security office. The numbers of claimants who had representation at appeal tribunals in Northern Ireland in 1985 are as set out:

Prisoners (Strip Searches)

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will give a monthly breakdown of strip searches conducted at Armagh prison during 1985 and January 1986 according to reason for search and giving for each month the total number of strip searches and the total number of inmates searched.

Mr. Scott: For the month of January 1986, I refer the right hon. and learned Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on 25 February, at column 495. The following table sets out the details of the searches conducted at Armagh prison during 1985:

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will give a monthly breakdown of strip searches conducted at the Maze prison during 1985 and January 1986 according to reason for search and giving for each month the total number of strip searches and the total number of inmates searched.

Mr. Scott: The information requested could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether there are any differences in substance or detail as between men and women prisoners in the procedures used in practice for strip searching in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: Strip searches are carried out on male prisoners in a wider range of circumstances than on females, and the procedures differ in detail.

With male prisoners the search consists of a visual check of the upper and lower parts of the body in turn; no sheet or alternative prison clothing is provided, and the search may take place in a cell, search cubicle or room.

With female inmates the search consists of a visual check either of the upper and lower parts of the body in turn or of the entire body at the choice of the inmate; a top and skirt or a freshly laundered sheet is available for use by female inmates during the searches, which are carried out in a search cubicle affording some degree of privacy.

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether there are any differences in substance or detail in the procedures used in practice for strip searching in Northern Ireland compared to (a) England, (b) Scotland and (c) Wales.

Mr. Scott: I understand that the procedures used in Northern Ireland are similar to those used in Great Britain. However, the procedures in Great Britain are matters for my right hon. Friends the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on what dates drugs were found during strip searches of prisoners in Armagh prison, the names of the drugs in each case, the quantities, and the sources from which they had been obtained.

Mr. Scott: The information is as follows:

Date and Quantity and Type of Drug	Where found
19 April 1983
15 Valium (5) tablets 2 Serenided tablets	On the floor of the search cubicle under the prisoner's foot.
28 June 1985
27 Libraxin (2·5 mg) tablets 12 Librium (5 mg) tablets 1 Buscafen (10 mg) tablet 3 Ativan (5 mg) tablets 4 Ativan (2·5 mg) tablets	In items of the prisoners' clothing and in parts of the reception area in which she had previously been.

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland at what level of seniority prison officers may, in practice (a) take decisions to strip search prisoners and (b) make suggestions to more senior officers that particular prisoners be strip searched, in Northern Ireland prisons.

Mr. Scott: The selection of prisoners for strip searching is done by an officer of at least principal officer rank. Where an officer suspects a prisoner of being in possession of illicit material, a special search may be carried out on the authority of the governor, deputy governor or chief officer.

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether, in the process of the transfer of prisoners from Armagh prison to Maghaberry prison they will be strip searched on leaving Armagh prison or on reception into Maghaberry prison.

Mr. Scott: It would not be appropriate, before the transfers of the women prisoners from Armagh to Maghaberry, to give information about any aspect of the security arrangements affecting the move.

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on what basis strip searches are conducted in Armagh prison; to what extent randomness is a factor; and what grounds prison officers require before conducting such searches.

Mr. Scott: Strip searching is an essential security precaution, whose purpose is to detect small items of contraband which can be concealed easily about the body and cannot reliably be detected by other means of searching.

Prisoners at Armagh prison are routinely strip-searched on admission into and when discharged from the prison, when going and returning from home leave and before going on inter-prison visits. On all other occasions, including attendance at court, the searches are carried out on the basis of random selection; this is done so as to avoid any readily discernible pattern of searching. Strip searches may also be carried out in any particular case where an officer has grounds for suspecting a prisoner of possessing any illicit item.

Nuclear Bunkers

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if a bunker connected with Gough barracks, Armagh, features in the Government's contingency plans for the event of actual or threatened nuclear attack.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1986, c. 171-72]: Gough barracks does not feature in civil defence contingency plans.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why the Government have decided that the proposed new nuclear bunkers should not be sited in the area which houses the normal peacetime administration of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1986, c. 171-72]: The risk of breakdown of public administration is considerably lessened by locating alternative administrative centres from the peacetime headquarters.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement outlining the condition of Belfast in the event of nuclear attack as assessed by the Government in their consideration of the plans for the three new bunkers.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1986, c. 171-72]: The Government cannot forecast targets which may be chosen for attack by a hostile power in the event of war. The extent of the destruction caused by a nuclear attack would vary with the scale and nature of the attack.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the proposed arrangements following completion of the three new nuclear bunkers outlining what actual affairs will be managed or monitored from each of the bunkers.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1986, c. 171-72]: It is intended that essential services to the community will be co-ordinated from three proposed civil defence centres should normal peacetime arrangements for these services be threatened or damaged during a war emergency.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the latest estimate for the cost of building the three new nuclear bunkers; what proportion of this is accounted for by security costs; and what is the estimated cost of maintaining the bunkers once they have been built.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1986, c. 171-72]: The latest estimate of the cost of building the three proposed civil defence centres in Northern Ireland is £7·8 million. Included in this sum is a figure of £540,000 for site security. The cost of maintaining the centres when constructed has not been precisely determined, but it will be relatively low because the buildings will not normally be staffed in peacetime.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what role the civil defence main control building in Mount Eden park, Belfast, will play in the new arrangements following completion o the three nuclear bunkers.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1986, c. 171-72]: No decision has yet been taken on the long-term role of the building at Mount Eden park.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when work will begin on the proposed three new nuclear bunkers in Northern Ireland; when it will be completed; and what role the Property Services Agency will have in the development of the three proposed sites.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1986, c. 171-72]: Construction of the three civil defence centres is now scheduled to start in 1987 and to be completed in 1989. The buildings were designed by a project team from the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland and construction will be supervised by them. The Property Services Agency, although not directly involved in the project, has made available to the design team its considerable experience of similar buildings in Great Britain.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statment outlining the restrictions or vetting to be imposed on the selection of contractors and employees at the sites of the proposed three nuclear bunkers; under what restrictions workers at the sites will operate; and if he will make a statement outlining what type of security measures will be taken around the sites to prevent public access or view.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1986, c. 171-72]: Arrangements for contractors and their employees will be the same as for those employed for other Government building work. It is intended to provide commercial site security during construction. The public will, therefore, not be permitted access during construction, but no special measures are envisaged to prevent public view.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in which sectors of United Kingdom manufacturing industry there has been an overseas trade surplus in each of the past six years.

Mr. Alan Clark: In each of the following groups of the standard industrial classification (1980) there has been an overseas trade surplus in each of the years 1979-1984:

Group

222 Steel tubes
233 Salt extraction and refining
241 Structural clay products
244 Asbestos goods
248 Refractory and ceramic goods

427 Brewing and malting
429 Tobacco
431 Woollen and worsted industry
434 Flax etc spinning and weaving

481 Rubber products

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in which sectors of United Kingdom manufacturing industry there has been, since 1979, a trend towards a smaller overseas trade deficit or a larger overseas trade surplus.

Mr. Alan Clark: Trade balances tend to be erratic from year to year and steady trends are uncommon. The following groups of the standard industrial classification (1980) have shown a firmly established, but not necessarily regular, improvement in trade balances since 1979:

SIC Group

233 Salt extraction and refining
245 Working of stone and other non-metal minerals not elsewhere specified
256 Special industrial and agricultural chemicals
257 Pharmaceutical products
424 Spirit distilling and compounding
434 Flax etc spinning and weaving
464 Wooden containers
475 Printing and publishing

Electronics Industry

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will seek minimum levels of local content in electronic products of overseas manufacturers selectively assisted with inward investment projects.

Mr. Butcher: When offering selective financial assistance, the Government seek to maximise the overall national benefit, if appropriate including the level of local content envisaged.

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the level of Government support for the microelectronics industry for 1984 and 1985; and what information he has on comparable figures for France, Germany and Japan.

Mr. Butcher: The level of Department of Trade and Industry support for the United Kingdom microelectronics industry was £26 million in the 1984-85 financial year and is likely to be about £35 million in the current year. Since these figures include assistance under investment, regional and collaborative research support programmes, we do not have comparable figures for other countries.

Import Substitution

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of his Department's encouragement to import substitution by smaller companies.

Mr. Alan Clark: Much of the Department's work to encourage innovation and improve the competitiveness of British industry has a reduction of imports as one of its effects. In addition, the Government encourage private sector initiatives aimed at identifying opportunities for United Kingdom companies, notably exhibitions of imported products arranged for that purpose. These are of particular benefit to the smaller company.

Oil Exports

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of all goods exported from the United Kingdom (a) in volume and (b) in value is accounted for by oil exports.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is as follows:

United Kingdom exports of oil as a percentage of total exports
Balance of payments basis

	Percentage at 1980 prices	Percentage at current prices
1980	12·9	12·9
1981	15·5	17·9
1982	20·1	19·2
1983	22·0	20·6
1984	18·8	21·1
1985	22·4	20·6

Consumer Credit Act 1974

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to amend section 75 of the Consumer Credit Act 1974; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: Following the full implementation of the Consumer Credit Act in May 1985 I am keeping the operation of the Act as a whole under review but I have no immediate plans to amend section 75 or any of the main provisions of the Act.

Fisheries Council (Tariff Quotas)

Sir Michael Shaw asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the adoption of tariff quotas for fishery products agreed at the Fisheries Council in December 1985.

Mr. Alan Clark: As requested by the House of Commons Select Committee on European Legislation, I wish to explain the agreement by the Government to the adoption of tariff quotas for certain fishery products before the Select Committee had a proper opportunity to scrutinise them. The quotas were associated with a package of measures for the fisheries sector which included proposals for 1986 guide prices. The Select Committee had already recommended that the revised guide prices should be considered further by the House, but that this consideration should not delay their adoption. Their introduction to take effect from 1 January 1986 was of considerable importance to the United Kingdom fishing industry. When the Fisheries Council considered the above package on 16 December, it became clear that early adoption of the guide prices would be dependent on the acceptance of these additional, though short-term, tariff quotas which had been brought forward without warning at a late stage. In order to avoid delay, the United Kingdom agreed to the adoption of all the measures although the tariff quotas had not been scrutinised by Parliament. I regret that the normal parliamentary procedures were not followed on this occasion but, in the circumstances, I hope the House will understand why it was felt best in the overall United Kingdom interest to act in this way.

Cammell Laird

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the original deadline for bids for Vickers Cammell Laird yard; on what basis and on what terms an extension was granted and to whom; what steps he took to satisfy himself that such an extension would enable commercial confidentiality to be maintained for other bids; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 3 March, c. 43]: Lazard Brothers, who are handling the sale of the warship yards on behalf of British Shipbuilders, originally invited bids by 12 noon on 25 February. As a result of a request from one bidder on 21 February, and with the agreement of all concerned, Lazards then told all bidders that they should receive bids by 5 pm on Tuesday 25 February. Lazards said they might reject any bid received after that time and date.

I understand that, shortly before 5 pm on 25 February, Lazards agreed to a request from one bidder to receive its bid shortly after 5 pm. Lazards have assured me that no other bid had been received when the request was granted, and that the confidentiality of any bids received was fully respected.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Arms Reductions

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent progress has been made in the discussion with the Soviet Union on arms reductions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The United Kingdom fully supports the latest United States proposals put forward at the Geneva negotiations, which, with their earlier proposals of 1 November, provide a sound basis for agreement. The immediate Soviet response has been disappointing.

At the talks on mutual and balanced force reductions in Vienna, the East have regrettably failed to match their words with serious deeds, by reviving old and inadequate verification proposals in their negative reaction to the constructive Western proposal of December 1985.

Libya (Technology)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has received representations from the Government of the United States of America concerning contracts for the supply of technology by the United Kingdom to Libya; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The Americans have invited us to adopt measures similar to those announced by President Reagan in January but have not made representations about specific contracts. We have assured them that we will do nothing to undercut the United States measures.

UNRWA (Arab Contributions)

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what sums have been contributed by each of the Arab states towards the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for each of the last 10 years, in constant prices.

Mr. Renton: The information is not available in the form requested. The actual contributions by Arab states were as follows:

HOME DEPARTMENT

British Citizenship (Indian Subcontinent)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people from the Indian subcontinent (a) applied and (b) were registered as British citizens between 1980 and 1985.

Mr. Waddington: The available information on grants of British citizenship by previous nationality is given, for the years 1964 to 1984, in table 4 of Home Office statistical bulletin "Citizenship Statistics United Kingdom 1984" (Issue 21/85). Figures for 1985 will be published in August. Corresponding information on the nationality of applicants for British citizenship is not available.

Heathrow Airport (Armed Police)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultations took place with the Police Federation before the decision was taken to arm police officers at Heathrow airport an other airports in Britain.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner that, for reasons of operational urgency, there was insufficient time for formal consultations with the Police Federation before the decision overtly to arm police officers at Heathrow airport was taken; local representatives of the federation were, however, informed as soon as possible thereafter. The only other airport at which police officers are overtly armed is Manchester international airport and I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given by the Prime Minister to a question from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) on 15 January at columns 578-9.

Police Resources

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of the additional resources made available to the West Mercia constabulary following his answer of 11 February, Official Report, column 361.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves) on 12 February at column 463. The budget for the West Mercia police is a matter for the West Mercia police authority.

Libyan Technicians

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Libyan technicians are at present training in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that this information is not available from immigration records.

Racial Harassment (Metropolitan Police Area)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide figures detailing incidents of racial harassment in the Metropolitan police district, by borough, for each year since 1983.

Mr. Mellor: As stated in the reply to the hon. Member on 6 February at columns 229-30, the term "racial harassment" has no standard definition and no figures are available for it. I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the available information on recorded racial incidents by borough is as given in the following table. The changes may reflect changes in the extent of recording rather than changes in the number of incidents occurring.

Detained Persons

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for reports from chief constables detailing a breakdown of reasons for the detention of those persons held for over 24 hours under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, since 1 January; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will call for reports from chief constables as to how many persons have been detained under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, by district, since it came into force on 1 January for (a) up to 24 hours, (b) up to 36 hours, (c) up to 72 hours and (d) up to 96 hours.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Parliament has decided that chief officers of police should be required to publish an annual report of the numbers of persons kept in police detention for more than 24 hours and subsequently released without charge; the number of applications for warrants of further detention and the results of the applications; and, in relation to each warrant of further detention, the period of further detention authorised by it, the period which the person named in it spent in police detention on its authority and whether he was charged or released without charge. This is provided for in section 50 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. Information on the operation of those parts of the Act for which chief officers of police are required to keep figures (under sections 5, 50 and 55) will be published in Home Office statistical bulletins. It is planned to issue the first of these in the middle of this year, giving statistics on the operation of the Act in the first quarter of 1986. We do not believe the additional statistical exercise would be justified.

AIDS

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answers to the hon. Member for Leicester, East, Official Report, 3 March, column 49, what information he has concerning (i) the number of prisoners diagnosed as having acquired immune deficiency syndrome and (ii) the number of prisoners who have been diagnosed as having HTLV III antibody positive or who are undergoing tests for viral infectivity.

Mr. Mellor: We have received no report of a current case of diagnosed AIDS in the prison population of England and Wales. Twenty one inmates are reported to have been diagnosed as HTLV III antibody positive and a further three as undergoing an HTLV III antibody test. Statistics relating to other tests are not kept.

Prisoners (Blood Tests)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will require all prisoners to undergo a blood test at the time of admission to any prison establishment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: There is no statutory power to take blood in the absence of consent. A blood test for medical reasons is considered only if an inmate requests one or if the medical officer judges a test to be clinically appropriate in a particular case and the inmate concerned gives informed consent. One purpose of the medical examination and inquiry to which all inmates are subject on first reception is to establish whether there is a history or risk of infectious disease calling for further medical investigation.

Child Spouses

Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy on admitting child spouses to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: The present immigration rules provide for the admission of spouses subject to certain requirements. Immediate steps are being taken to change the immigration rules to prevent the entry as spouses of children under the age of 16.

Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why Elham Bahrami was permitted to enter the United Kingdom from Iran as a spouse, despite being aged 12 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: Elham Bahrami was issued with a visa to come to this country at the British interests section of the Swedish embassy in Tehran under the immigration rules, after it had been established that her marriage was valid according to the law of Iran and would be recognised as valid under English laws because both parties to the marriage were domiciled in Iran. Immediate steps are being taken to change the immigration rules to prevent the entry as spouses of children under the age of 16.

Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many child spouses are known to have been allowed to enter the United Kingdom in each of the last five years.

Mr. Waddington: It has never been thought necessary to keep statistics of the age of spouses entering the country but immediate steps are being taken to change the immigration rules to prevent the entry as spouses of children under the age of 16.

Firearms

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement upon the availability of handguns, legally and illegally, and what his policy is in relation to the issue of licences for handguns.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 19 February, c. 177]: The information kept centrally about the number of firearm certificates issued by chief officers of police does not distinguish between those issued in respect of handguns and those authorising the possession of other weapons. The criteria for granting certificates were set out in the reply given to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) on 11 February at column 393. Although there is no reliable estimate of the number of illegal handguns in circulation, the number of notifiable offences in which a pistol was reported to have been used in 1984 was 1,232. In the same year, 164 pistols were reported to have been stolen in burglaries and thefts.

Ulster Defence Association

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of West Yorkshire on the progress of inquiries into, and charges arising from, the alleged illegal activities of members of extremist organisations and on the possible links between such organisations and the Ulster Defence Association; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 24 February, c. 414]: The chief constable of West Yorkshire informs me that his force investigates thoroughly offences such as racial attacks and incitement to racial hatred which are reported to it, and in doing so takes due account of the possible involvement of extremist organisations in such activities. Proceedings are brought where the evidence justifies it.

The Ulster Defence Association is not a proscribed organisation in any part of the United Kingdom, so that links with it and membership of it are not in themselves unlawful.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Contraceptive Advice (Young People)

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he will issue revised guidance on contraceptive advice and treatment for young people under 16 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: This guidance is being issued today. It takes account of the recent House of Lords decision on the provision of contraceptive advice and treatment to girls under 16. It stresses the importance of involving parents when contraceptive advice is being sought by young people under 16 and states that it should be most unusual for a doctor or other professional to provide advice or treatment in relaton to contraception to such a young person without parental knowledge or consent. It acknowledges that there will, exceptionally, be cases where it is not possible to persuade a young person to allow her parents to be involved—for example, when family relationships have broken down. In such cases, a doctor or other professional would be justified in giving advice and treatment without parental consent or knowledge, provided he is satisfied on the following points:

i. that the young person could understand his advice, and had sufficient maturity to understand what was involved in terms of the moral, social and emotional implications;
ii. that he could neither persuade the young person to inform the parent, nor to allow him to inform them, that contraceptive advice was being sought;
iii. that the young person would be very likely to begin, or to continue having sexual intercourse with or without contraceptive treatment;
iv. that, without contraceptive advice or treatment, the young person's physical or mental health, or both would be likely to suffer;
v. that the young person's best interests required him to give contraceptive advice, treatment or both, without parental knowledge or consent.

I am placing a copy of the full text of the guidance in the Library.

Pregnancy Testing

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many district health authorities do not provide a free pregnancy testing service during the suspected first eight weeks of a routine pregnancy.

Mr. Whitney: We do not collect this information centrally. Health authorities are aware of the importance of facilities being available to confirm pregnancy and thus encourage an early uptake of care.

Pensions and Benefits

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the total numbers of people in the United Kingdom in receipt of (a) retirement pension only, (b) supplementary pension only, (c) retirement pension and supplementary pension, (d) all public sector pension schemes and (e) retirement pension and a public sector pension, for each year since 1973-74.

Mr. Major: The information is not readily available in the form requested, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The following table sets out the details which are available.

The great majority of public sector pensioners (excluding men between 60 and 65) will also be in receipt of a state retirement pension. No figures are available for the numbers also receiving supplementary pension.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has received any recent representations from Scotland about the operation of the exceptionally severe weather payments scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I met the members of the Scottish Labour group on 27 February to discuss, among other things, the subject of help with fuel costs during exceptionally severe weather. The matter was also touched on at a meeting between my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State with the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) and the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) on 11 February to discuss the wider issues of a "cold climate allowance". A number of letters have also been received.

Following revised guidance issued by the chief adjudication officer on 6 December the decision whether there has been a period of exceptionally severe weather in any particular area is one for the local adjudication officer, in the light of local weather conditions. I understand that all the local offices for the Scottish mainland have now decided that the weather has fulfilled the requirements of the relevant single payments regulation.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many local Department of Health and Social Security offices have made additional payments to benefits claimants in each of the last seven years owing to exceptionally severe weather conditions; and what range of payments were made available.

Mr. Newton: No information is available for 1979 and 1980. The weather was not considered to be exceptionally severe during 1981, 1983 and 1984 and therefore no single payments in respect of additional fuel used during a period of exceptionally severe weather were made in those years.

In 1982 the weather was considered to be exceptionally severe in all local office areas in Great Britain. In 1985, it was considered to be exceptionally severe in a total of 288 local office areas in England and Wales, and this year all local offices except one (Lerwick) have declared the weather to be exceptionally severe in their area.

Information on the range of payments made during the relevant years is not available.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether general practitioners were sent the revisions to the limited list before they came into operation on 1 December 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I understand that most family practitioner committees were able to notify general practitioners of the changes before the effective date. My Department is introducing revised arrangements to give all family practitioner committees more notice of any future changes.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the minimum time allowed for the consultation stage of a hospital closure initiated by a district health authority; what is the usual time for the submission by the district health authority of its decision to the regional health authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: There is no statutory minimum time allowed for consultation on a proposed hospital closure initiated by a district health authority. Circular HSC(IS)207 gives guidance from my Department to health authorities on reasonable practices to follow. This circular advises that health authorities should normally require comments from community health councils and other interested bodies within a period of three months after the issue of the consultation document. The aim, in a case where the community health council does not oppose the proposed closure, is for the district health authority to advise the regional health authority of its intention no later than six months after the date of issue of the consultation document.

Nurses

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report those health authorities where nurses have taken over any duties previously performed by National Health Service ancillary workers, since these services were put out to tender.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not collected centrally. It is the responsibility of health authorities to decide who will perform particular duties.

Nursing Care

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans for the privatisation of nursing care.

Mr. Whitney: We have no plans to do so.

Women (Dependent Children)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of women who are single, widowed, separated, with dependent children under 16 years of age for each of the years 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not routinely available. There are estimates for 1979 and 1982, which were given in my reply to the hon. Member on 2 December 1985 at column 127.

Hospitals (Catering)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will seek to make mandatory the post of catering manager or catering adviser in all hospitals above a specified size.

Mr. Hayhoe: Health authorities have responsibility for ensuring that they have effective management and advisory arrangements for their catering services. It is for authorities to determine within their overall management arrangements how best to achieve this.

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to bring the National Health Service hospital catering service within the scope of the Hotel and Catering Industry Training Board.

Mr. Whitney: There is already close liaison between the National Health Service training authority and the Hotel and Catering industry training boards on training initiatives and developments. We have no plans to introduce changes to these arrangements.

School Leavers (Benefits)

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest estimate for the number of 1985 school leavers who had their benefit cut as a result of leaving YTS prematurely or refusing to take up a place on the scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: It is not possible to distinguish between school leavers and others. The number of young people who had their supplementary benefit reduced because they had without good cause (a) refused, or (b) left prematurely, a place on the youth training scheme during the period 16 January 1985 to 14 January 1986 was : 338 and 5,427 respectively.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pensioner households in the area served by the Huddersfield benefit office lost housing benefit as a result of the changes which came into effect in November 1985; and how many of these lost (a) up to £1 a week, (b) between £1 and £2 a week, (c) between £3 and £4 a week and (d) more than £3 a week.

Mr. Major: I regret this information is not available.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has as to the proportion of council house tenants in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland who receive housing benefit;

(2) what information he has as to the proportion of domestic ratepayers in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland who receive housing benefit.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of people in (a) Yorkshire and Humberside, (b) West Yorkshire, (c) Kirklees and (d) the Huddersfield areas currently in receipt of supplementary benefit; how many of the claimants are retirement pensioners; and how these numbers compare with the corresponding figure for 1979.

Mr. Major: The table shows the number of people in (a) Yorkshire and Humberside (b) West Yorkshire (c) Kirklees and (d) Huddersfield, receiving supplementary benefit on 11 February 1986 — the latest figures available — and 15 May 1979 — the earliest figures available. It also shows how many of these were over pension age.

Speech Therapy, Waltham Forest

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what funds are allocated to the Waltham Forest district health authority by his Department through the regional health authority to improve the provision of speech therapy services at special schools in the area.

Mr. Whitney: Funds allocated to regional health authorities are not earmarked in respect of speech therapy services. It is the responsibility of the Waltham Forest district health authority to determine spending on those services from within its total allocation.

Health Regions (Litigation Costs)

Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list by health region the costs to that region of litigation for all cases whether settled in or out of court over each of the last five years.

Mr. Whitney: The table shows the total amounts paid in compensation as a result of court decisions, legal advice or out-of-court settlements, as recorded in health authorities' annual accounts. The payments do not include authorities' legal costs which are treated as an administrative expense.

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for ocial Services wht is the normal practice regarding re-ssessment of previous years' liabilities under class 1 ational insurance contributions, primary or secondary, here a Department of Health and Social Security spector has re-classified a self-employed person as an mployee under the terms of the Social Security Acts.

Mr. Major: The normal practice is to assess earlier ability under class 1 when a person previously paying ass 2 contributions is re-categorised as an employee. owever, full account is taken of all the circumstances efore a decision is made to require payment by the mployer of any amount due. Rulings by the Department's ational insurance inspectors about liability to pay ontributions, including rulings on the class of ontributions due, are open to challenge by those affected they wish, and then become questions for formal termination by the Secretary of State under section 93 the Social Security Act 1975.

Students (Benefits)

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost of paying supplementary benefit to students from the first signing day for which they are eligible; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Payment of supplementary benefit as a rule commences from the second day after the claimants' signing day. If students were to be paid from their signing day there would be some losers and some gainers but it is not possible to estimate the overall effect.

Community Nursing Services (Report)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which of the recommendations in the report on community nursing services compiled by Mrs. Cumberlege he intends to implement; and what consultations he proposes to hold with general practitioners to discuss with them the recommendations relating to prescription of medicines by nurses.

Mr. Hayhoe: There will be wide consultation on the Report of the community nursing review when it is published, and that will include consultations with representatives of general practitioners.

Winwick Hospital

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the regional health authority's recommended complement of nurses for Winwick hospital; how many nurses it is currently below this total; what steps are being made to remedy this shortfall; how many temporary nurses are employed there; when their contract terminates; what steps are being taken to recruit temporary nurses and in what numbers; and if he will list the number of patients for each year from 1980 to 1986.

Mr. Hayhoe: Information on the number of patients in Winwick hospital for the years 1980 to 1985 (the latest date for which figures are available) are shown in the table.

I regret that the other information requested is not collected centrally and the hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of Mersey regional health authority.

Bloomsbury Health Authority

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will establish an inquiry under section 84 of the National Health Service Act 1977 into the provision of services by the Bloomsbury health authority.

Mr. Whitney: No.

Greater London (Accident and Emergency Services)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will establish an inquiry into the provision of accident and emergency services in Greater London.

Mr. Whitney: We have no plans to do so.

Greater London (Ambulance Services)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will establish an inquiry into the provision of ambulance services in Greater London.

Mr. Whitney: We have no plans to do so. It is for the South West Thames regional health authority, which manages the London ambulance service on behalf of the Thames regions, to initiate action as and when it feels it is necessary.

Organ Transplants

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to introduce legislation to require doctors to seek permission to remove kidneys and other organs from patients each time a life support machine is switched off; what advice he has received from the United Kingdom transplant service on this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) on 4 March at columns 123-24. No representations on this matter have been received from the United Kingdom transplant service.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what figures he has for the current availability of kidney donations in relation to demand for transplant purposes.

Mr. Whitney: According to information supplied by the United Kingdom transplant service, the number of cadaver kidney transplant operations performed in the National Health Service in 1985 was 1,336 and the number of patients on the waiting list for kidney transplant on 1 January 1986 was 3,305. We are concerned to see the kidney transplant programme expanded, but this can only happen if the supply of donor organs increases. Ministers have taken a number of initiatives in the last two years to encourage more donations, for example I recently approached representatives of industry about this, and I am glad to say that they have agreed to co-operate with our efforts.

Hypothermia

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of people who have died in each year from 1979 to the latest available year from hypothermia (a) nationally, (b) in each social security region, and (c) in each standard economic planning region.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1985, c. 321-322]: I regret that there were some errors in my previous reply. The table in its corrected form is as follows.

EMPLOYMENT

Youth Training

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the future of the youth training board of the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Trippier: The Manpower Services Commission agreed at its meeting in October 1985 to extend appointments to the Youth Training Board to June 1986 so that the future role of the board could be considered in the light of proposals for the development of YTS. The commission will again consider the reconstitution of the board in the near future.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Paymaster General, pursuant to the answer of 24 February, Official Report, column 452, what encouragement the Manpower Services Commission proposes to give to managing agents to give trainee agreements contractual status; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: None. Managing agents will make their own decisions on this. It is, however, the Manpower Services Commission's view that the purpose of the training agreement is to ensure that all trainees have full and clear information about their training programme and their treatment while on it; and that contractual status is not essential for this purpose.

Telecommunications Courses (Libyan Citizens)

Mr. Janner asked the Paymaster General how many work permits have been issued for Libyan citizens to attend telecommunications courses in each of the last three years.

Mr. Lang: Work permits for training in telecommunications would be issued only under the training and work experience scheme. No work permits were issued to Libyan citizens in this category in 1985 or 1983. Three permits were issued in 1984 but statistics for that year do not specify what sort of training was involved. We also authorise industrial attachments required by sandwich courses, but statistics are not kept of the nationality of students or the type of training undertaken.

SCOTLAND

Forestry Commission

46. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is proposing to reduce the Forestry Commission holding of woodland.

47. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the Government's plan to privatise the Forestry Commission.

49. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the Forestry Commission.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans are being considered by his Department for the further privatisation of Forestry Commission assets.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer the hon. Members to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) on 20 February 1986 at column 347.

48. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the implications for the long-term development of land use in the United Kingdom of the plan to dispose of some Forestry Commission land.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission's disposals programme is based upon the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger) on 8 November 1984 at columns 6 and 7. The programme is a limited one and has no particular implications for the long-term development of land use in the United Kingdom.

Sheltered Accommodation

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the ratio of places available in Inverclyde, Strathclyde and Scotland as a whole in sheltered accommodation per 1,000 people aged 65 or over, for each years since 1979.

Mr. Ancram: The table below shows the numbers of bedspaces per 1,000 population aged 65 or over for the areas requested for each year since 1979.

	Scotland	Strathclyde	Inverclyde
1979	15·6	13·1	16·0
1980	19·3	15·0	19·6
1981	22·8	17·4	19·9
1982	29·7	25·1	26·3
1983	35·3	26·7	35·3
1984	41·1	32·1	38·4
1985	47·6	39·8	38·4

Mallaig Road

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects his Department to complete planning of the section of the Mallaig road which runs into the village; and when the construction will be finished.

Mr. Ancram: I expect the statutory and design procedures to be completed in time for an autumn 1986 start, provided that funds are available. Construction should take approximately two years.

Radioactive Discharges

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all the non-nuclear industrial sites in Scotland making authorised discharges of uranium and other radioactive materials to the sea.

Mr. Ancram: The non-nuclear industrial sites in Scotland including offshire oil installations which are authorised to discharge radioactive wastes to sea are listed below.

Peterhead Prison

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the circumstances of the attempt by two inmates of Peterhead prison to escape in January; and when the matter was reported to him.

Mr. John MacKay: No attempt to escape from Peterhead prison was made during January 1986. Several items which might have been used in an escape bid were found during a search by staff on 29 December 1985 and this was reported to the Scottish Home and Health Department on 3 January 1986.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied that there are sufficient prison officers available on each shift to supervise properly the activities of inmates in the tailor's shop at Peterhead prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: I am satisfied that the prison governor is making proper arrangements for such supervision.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will investigate the method of purchase and delivery of cloth materials to the tailor's shop at Peterhead prison; and what steps are taken to seek to prevent the misuse of these materials by inmates who are engaged on work in the tailor's shop.

Mr. John MacKay: The materials used in the tailoring workshop at Peterhead are purchased centrally and delivered to the prison by Scottish Office vehicles as cut parts for making up into garments. The cut parts are issued to the workshop from a lockfast store in sufficient quantities to manufacture a specific number of garments. In this way misuse can be identified and checked. Prisoners are searched each time they leave the workshop in order to prevent attempted pilfering of equipment or materials.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to visit Peterhead prison.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans at present to visit Peterhead prison. However, it is my intention to visit in the near future.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what further progress has been made with the plans for the new Peterhead prison; when the project will commence; what consultations have taken place with the Peterhead branch of the Scottish Prison Officers Association; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram) on 26 March 1985. The sketch design stage of the planning of the new Peterhead prison is very close to completion following which the final design plan will be agreed. The initial brief for the new prison was discussed with the Peterhead branch of the Scottish Prison Officers Association and their comments have been taken into account throughout the sketch design stage.

Scottish Development Agency

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing at 1985 prices Government expenditure on the Scottish Development Agency in each year since the agency was established and his estimate for each year until 1988.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Net public expenditure on the agency for the financial years 1976-77 to 1984-85, together with the estimated outturn for 1985-86 and the planned level for 1986-87, all at 1984-85 prices are shown below. Expenditure in 1975-76 has been omitted as the agency was in being for only a small part of that year. The public expenditure plans for the years after 1986-87 are not disaggregated to the level of specific provision for the agency.

	£ million
1976-77	35·4
1977-78	78·4
1978-79	93·4
1979-80	98·2
1980-81	100·9
1981-82	88·6
1982-83	110·0
1983-84	92·3
1984-85	76·6
1985-86	90·9
1986-87	86·7

The fact that these figures are net of expenditure financed from receipts is part of the explanation for the variations between years. In 1984-85, for example, receipts were very much higher than forecast and the agency did not need to draw down its grant-in-aid in full.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library a copy of the guidelines under which the Scottish Development Agency presently operates.

Mr. Rifkind: The agency has guidelines relating to site development and factory building and industrial investment. Copies were placed in the Library of the House when they were issued in 1980.

Mental Illness Hospitals

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many inpatient beds existed in mental illness hospitals in Scotland in each of the last seven years for which records are available.

Mr. Rifkind: This information is as follows:

Average available staffed mental illness beds (including beds at general hospitals with psychiatric units) at 30 September

	Mental illness	Psycho-geriatric	Child psychiatry	Adolescent psychiatry	Total
1978	15,379	1,995	139	64	17,577

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Food Additives

13. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he plans any new initiatives relating to the use of additives in food.

Mr. Gummer: Strict control of the use of additives in food is already maintained through the provisions in the Food Acts and by regulations made thereunder. Ministers seek the advice of the Food Advisory Committee on a continuing basis about the need, safety and control of food additives.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

14. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on progress to date on consultations towards the establishment of environmentally sensitive areas.

Mr. Jopling: As I explained in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) on 4 March, my officials are in close touch with the Countryside Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council, which are now carrying out a detailed analysis of the short-listed areas in England and Wales in consultation with the various organisations concerned. They expect to complete this work around Easter and will be making recommendations to me and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales by the end of April.

Food Advisory Committees

15. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what constraints are placed on members of food advisory committees in relation to disclosure of information.

Mr. Gummer: Members of the independent export committees who advise Ministers in these matters need to observe the appropriate status of official information passed to them in the course of their duties.

Outgoers Scheme

16. Mr. Knox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he hopes to announce the details of the European Economic Community outgoers scheme which the Commission has proposed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The Commission's proposed scheme was discussed for the first time by the Council of Agriculture Ministers last week. There was general agreement on the importance of reducing milk output, but there was no agreement on the best way of achieving this.

The question will be considered further.

Consumer Protection

17. Mr. Patchett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further measures on consumer protection in food matters he proposes to introduce in the next 12 months.

Mr. Gummer: We expect to publish a number of proposals including new compositional standards for mince and for margarine and other fat spreads. Proposals requiring the fat content labelling of food and guidelines on nutrition labelling have already been circulated for comment.

Food Labelling

18. Mr. Cohen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he plans to introduce legislation on the full nutritional labelling of food.

Mr. Gummer: No. We are encouraging voluntary labelling of food with its nutritional content by the issue of guidelines and we are considering whether it is appropriate to require such information to be given in a prescribed form.

Agricultural Prices

19. Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will make a statement on progress in the current round of negotiations in the European Council of Agriculture Ministers relating to agricultural prices.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the latest position in the negotiations to fix prices under the common agricultural policy for the coming year.

Mr. Jopling: The Agriculture Council had an initial discussion of the Commission's 1986 CAP price proposals on 24 February; its next discussion is expected to be on 24 March.

30. Mr. Jackson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the European Commission's price proposals for 1986-87.

Mr. Jopling: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) earlier today.

Coastal Defences

20. Mr. Rathbone asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the presently planned level of funding for coastal defences in 1986-87.

Mr. Gummer: I understand that water authorities and local authorities plan to undertake work on sea defences amounting to some £18 million in 1986-87 with the assistance of Government aid under the Land Drainage Act 1976. In addition, local authorities plan to undertake work combating coastal erosion amounting to some £20 million with the assistance of Government aid under the Coast Protection Act 1949.

Forestry Commission Land

21. Mr. Adley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, in his plans to authorise the disposal of Forestry Commission land in England, he will ensure that local authorities have an absolute priority to acquire such land in their own areas.

Mr. Jopling: It is recognised that many public and private bodies, including local authorities, have an interest in acquiring particular areas of Forestry Commission woodland. In order to draw attention at the ealiest stage to any such areas the commission is considering for disposal, notices are placed in the Estates Gazette in respect of all woods larger than 5 hectares and all other land having a known conservation, recreation or amenity value. In the event of a body expressing firm interest in acquiring such an area, the commission will consider giving it preference of opportunity to purchase if the Government Department or agency responsible for the specific interest concerned can confirm that such a purchase would be particularly in the public interest. It would not be right to give local authorities absolute priority over all other parties irrespective of the circumstances.

Farm Workers (Wages)

22. Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has issued any guidance to the Agricultural Wages Board about the Government's attitude to the level of any increase in the minimum rates for agricultural workers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: No.

26. Mr. Ashton asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the basic gross wages for a farm worker for a 40-hour week.

Mr. Jopling: In 1985 the average basic earnings of all regular whole-time men employed in agriculture in England and Wales were £107·40 for an average basic week of 39·8 hours.

Forestry

23. Mr. Yeo asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will introduce measures to encourage the proportion of land devoted to forestry in England.

Mr. Jopling: It is the Government's policy that forestry should continue to expand with the greater proportion of new planting being undertaken by the private sector. Such expansion is encouraged through a range of measures, principally by the Forestry Commission's grant schemes and appropriate tax arrangements, and in ways consistent with the interests of other land users.

27. Mr. Proctor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many trees were planted in 1985 by the Forestry Commission in East Anglia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: Planting statistics are kept by financial years to 31 March. In the year to 31 March 1985 the Forestry Commission planted 621 hectares in east Anglia, all in Norfolk and Suffolk.

COMA Report

24. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the latest progress of his Department's implementation of the recommendations of the COMA report.

Mr. Gummer: We circulated on 13 February for statutory consultation under the Food Acts prpoposals for the fat labelling of foods. Proposals for the strength marking throughout the European Community of all alcoholic drinks in percentage alcohol by volume are under discussions in Brussels. Changes to encourage the production of leaner carcases were introduced into the sheep variable premium scheme on 6 January 1986. Similar changes will be introduced into the beef scheme in the new marketing year.

Common Agricultural Policy

25. Mr. Baldry asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will set out the immediate reforms to the common agricultural policy that Her Majesty's Government consider desirable.

Mr. Jopling: In the negotiations on the Commission's proposals for CAP prices and related measures we are seeking a package of measures to limit the production of surplus commodities. A central element must be a tough price policy to secure a better market balance.

Farm Surpluses (Storage Costs)

28. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the cost of storing farm surpluses in the United Kingdom for the most recent year for which figures are available.

Mr. Gummer: Expenditure on storage and related costs of intervention in 1985-86 is expected to total £110 million as shown in the spring Supplementary Estimate for class III, vote 1 (H.C. 213).

Cereals

29. Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the EEC Commission's plans for cereal policies in the coming year; and if he will make a statement.

40. Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions he has had with European Community partners about controlling cereal productions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The Commission has proposed a package of measures for cereals including a price freeze, a co-responsibility levy on sales of cereals off farm and changes to the operation of the intervention system, including quality standards.

In initial discussions of these in the Council on 24 February, I pressed for a price cut instead of the co-responsibility levy, since the latter would as proposed be discriminatory in its application and does nothing to help users of cereals.

34. Mr. Nicholls asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he supports the proposal of the European Commission to impose a co-responsibility levy on cereals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given earlier to the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins).

Food Standards

31. Mr. Loyden asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his plans to improve the quality of food consumed in Britain.

Mr. Gummer: There is already comprehensive legislation regulating the safety, quality and labelling of food. Regulations are kept under review so that appropriate initiatives can be taken in response to new developments.

Cod Fishermen

32. Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what special help he proposes for cod fishermen in Grimsby to compensate for reduced catches as a result of the new quotas, and for increased costs as a result of higher dock, landing and labour charges.

Mr. Gummer: The new quotas introduced in order to help fishermen by protecting their future livelihood. The common fisheries policy provides a successful means of conserving fish stocks and thus preserving jobs. The reduction in the cod quota for 1986, which was based on scientific advice, was necessary to protect the longer term viability of the stock and therefore the incomes of fishermen. Various structural measures exist within the common fisheries policy to help the industry adjust to changes in the availability of resources. Charges for entering ports and landing catches are a local matter.

Milk Quotas

33. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he can report on the prospective arrangements for milk quotas in 1986-87.

Mr. Jopling: I shall shortly be laying before the House the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1986 which will provide, in England and Wales, for the further allocations of quota for 1985-86 which I announced in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) on 25 February. The effect of the regulations in Scotland was explained by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in his reply of 4 March to my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst). In other respects the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1986 will not alter the existing quota arrangements for 1986-87. They will consolidate the previous regulations and amendments.

The Commission has made two proposals which could affect the quota arrangements for 1986-87. First, there is the proposed Community outgoers scheme, which I referred to in replying to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) earlier today. Secondly, in the context of the price proposals, the Commission has proposed changing to six-monthly collection of the supplementary levy. While I recognise there could be difficulties for producers in this change (and I shall be seeking to minimise these difficulties), I believe it would reduce the risk of exceeding quota in the Community as a whole.

Breadmaking (Wheat)

35. Mr. Torney asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which research he plans to undertake to produce an increased proportion of wheat suitable for breadmaking in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Gummer: Some 82 per cent. of the wheat milled in the United Kingdom in 1984-85 was home-grown, compared with 54 per cent. in 1979-80. My Department currently funds a significant amount of reseach and development to improve the bread-making quality of wheat, and increasing emphasis is to be given to this aspect of research in the future.

Pelagic Fisheries Licensing

36. Mr. Wallace asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations he has received in the course of his review of pelagic fisheries licensing.

Mr. Gummer: Following the issue of a consultative paper on the review of the restrictive licensing arrangements in respect of the pelagic fisheries in October 1985, my right hon. Friends and I have received a total of 20 representations from industry organisations within the United Kingdom.

Community Budget (Agricultural Expenditure)

37. Mr. Foulkes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what initiatives he intends to take to bring down the proportion of the EEC budget spent on agriculture; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The financial guideline agreed by the Council in its conclusions on budgetary discipline provides that expenditure related to agricultural markets should grow by less than the rate of growth of the Community's own resources. In pursuit of this aim, I will continue to press in the Council of Agriculture Ministers for measures which will restrain the growth of expenditure, in particular rigorous constraint on prices.

Farm Incomes

38. Mr. Kennedy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the projected level of agricultural income for 1986-87.

Mr. Jopling: Agriculture income in 1986-87 will depend on decisions to be taken following the CAP price fixing negotiation, the weather, and other factors. It would be premature to make a projection of the level.

European Community (Food Exports)

39. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will propose at the next meeting of the Council of Ministers that the supplies of cheap food at present being sent to the Soviet Union and East Europe should be made available to pensioners and low-income families in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: A major objective of Government policy towards the common agricultural policy (CAP) is to tackle the problem of costly surpluses at source by bringing about a better market balance of supply and demand.

While surpluses continue to exist, however, the problem of their cost-effective disposal remains. Several Community schemes already exist which enable food supplies to be made available at reduced prices. In considering any extension account has to be taken of the likely cost and effectiveness. The most economical way of disposing of stocks is often to sell them on the world market with the benefit of export refunds to bridge the gap between Community and world prices. Where there are surpluses for export the Government remain opposed to singling out particular countries for special treatment.

Beef Producers

41. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the prospects for the beef sector of the agriculture industry.

Mr. Gummer: The beef sector has experienced two difficult years during which the imposition of milk quotas and the consequent increase in cow cullings coincided with a cyclical peak in production. Production is likely to continue at high levels until 1987 and, if there is a milk outgoers scheme, this will also affect the market.

I shall be concerned to ensure that the beef sector continues to receive adequate support.

Departmental Land

42. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much land and property is owned by his Department; what is his policy for its disposal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: My Department owns and manages 3,237 hectares of land and 291 dwellings. These comprise experimental centres, research establishments, fishery lands, former Land Settlement Association managed properties and tenanted farms. My policy is to sell all Ministry property and land that has been identified as surplus to requirements. This policy is being vigorously pursued.

Mutton and Beef

43. Sir John Farr asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the amount by which the price in the shops for mutton and beef has been reduced in pence per lb. by the variable premium system.

Mr. Gummer: At its maximum level (which applied for all but four weeks of 1985) the beef variable premium is worth 16·25p/kg on eligible carcases at the deadweight stage. This is equivalent to 10p to 10½p per lb at the retail level on beef from carcases which have benefited from premium.

So far as lamb is concerned, the rates of variable premium paid during 1985 ranged between 5·1p/kg and 84p·4/kg at the deadweight stage, with an average of 51p/kg. This would be equivalent to about 26p per lb at the retail level on lamb from certified carcases. Variable premium does not apply to mutton.

The actual effect on retail prices of the premium arrangements depends on butchers' pricing policies for various cuts and varieties of meat.

Beef Variable Premium

44. Mr. Livsey asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his negotiations in Europe to retain the beef variable premium.

Mr. Gummer: The Commission's price fixing package for 1986 proposed a number of changes in the support arrangements for the beef sector. In the negotiations, my right hon. Friend will be concerned to ensure that beef producers continue to have adequate support. As to the beef variable premium scheme, we shall continue to maintain that this has advantages for producers, traders and consumers alike.

River Mersey (Silt Disposal)

45. Mr. Parry asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the operation of the licence for silt disposal from the River Mersey, with regard to the level of mercury in the river.

Mr. Gummer: I am satisfied that silt from the River Mersey may be safely disposed of at sea under the terms set out in the licences of which I announced the renewal on 17 February.

English and Welsh Ports (Grants)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of Sea Food Industry Authority grants is allocated to English and Welsh ports.

Mr. Gummer: These grants are not proportionally allocated but are made available throughout the United Kingdom for approved projects. In the current financial year 574 projects in England and Wales have approval, and this represents 42 per cent. of the total.

Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce

Sir Richard Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to what extent consideration has been given to alternative sites for the offices of the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: In the absence of plans to move the board, no consideration has been given to alternative sites.

Feed Wheat

Sir Richard Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many tonnes of feed wheat were grown in the United Kingdom and subsequently put into intervention stores between the beginning of the 1985 harvest and the latest convenient date.

Mr. Gummer: 1·1 million tonnes of wheat were taken into intervention in the United Kingdom between the start of the 1985 harvest and 28 February 1986. All this is believed to be of United Kingdom origin.

Sir Richard Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food wht has been the average price received for feed wheat when sold out of intervention stores between the beginning of the harvest and 13 December 1985.

Mr. Gummer: The weighted average price of all home and export sales over this period of wheat bought in at the common intervention price was £83·71 per tonne.

Sir Richard Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the average price paid by the United Kingdom taxpayer for each tonne of feed wheat taken into intervention stores between the beginning of the 1985 harvest and 13 December 1985.

Mr. Gummer: The weighted average price paid for wheat taken into United Kingdom intervention stores over this period was £117·67 per tonne.

Sir Richard Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether any tonnes of feed wheat have been taken out of intervention stores between the beginning of the 1985 harvest and 13 December 1985 to be given away free; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: No.

Environmental Schemes (Grants)

Mr. Key asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what grants are available under the agriculture improvement scheme for environmentally positive schemes including the planting of trees and hedges and the building of traditional walls, banks and dykes; if he will quantify such grants; if he will state the value of such grants disbursed since they were introduced; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: Grants have been available since 1 October 1985 under the agricultural investment scheme for environmentally beneficial investments as follows:

Description	Rate of grant (per cent.) Basic	LFA
Bracken control (other than soil cultivation)	15	30
Dykes—using materials traditional in the locality	30	60
Heather burning—or regeneration by cutting	15	30
Hedges	30	60
Manure stores for poultry (not integral with poultry house)	15	30
Shelter belts (with 50 per cent. or more of broadleaved trees)	30	60
Walls—using materials traditional in the locality	30	60
Waste disposal (agricultural effluents and waste)	30	60

I regret that no information is available on the grants paid so far on these investments.

Sheep Annual Premium

Mr. Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the list of (a) breeds of ewe and (b) areas to be covered which Her Majesty's Government provided to the European Commission in connection with the extension of sheep annual premium to untupped shearlings; and when these submissions were first made.

Mr. Jopling: After the Council of Ministers agreed last May, as part of the 1985 price-fixing, to extend the annual premium arrangements "to certain mountain breeds of ewes, raised in well-defined regions, which are not covered by the present definition of eligible ewes", my officials gave the Commission the following details of the breeds and areas which we considered should be covered:

Breeds: Herdwick, Swaledale, Cheviot, Blackface, Shetland, Soay and crosses between any of these.

Areas: Cumbria—land defined as "severely disadvantaged" under the Hill Livestock (Compensatory Allowances) Regulations 1984 made in accordance with directive 75/268.

Scotland—land defined as "hill sheep land" under the same regulations.

When, in December, the Council of Ministers decided to restrict the concession to the Herdwick breed and to the Lake District, I made it quite clear that I considered this to be a breach of the agreement reached in May, and accordingly voted against the proposal. I shall continue to press for a suitable extension of the definition.

Food Imports

Mr. Greenway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much of United Kingdom food was imported in 1975, 1980 and 1985; at what cost; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: United Kingdom imports of food were valued at £3·6 billion in 1975, £5·1 billion in 1980 and £7·5 billion in 1984. Figures for 1985 are not yet available. Food imports represented 50 per cent., 48 per cent. and 52 per cent., respectively, of the estimated value of all food consumed in the United Kingdom.

Since 1975, the volume of food imports has remained broadly unchanged. Within the total, the volume of temperate foods imported has fallen by 15 per cent. At the same time food exports have increased by 50 per cent.

These figures reflect the success of the United Kingdom agricultural and food industries in taking advantage of the opportunities presented by membership of the European Community.

Sellafield

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied that the discharge from Sellafield on 23 January complied with the as low as reasonably achieveable requirement in the site authorisation issued by the Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have been asked to reply.

I am advised that the discharge from Sellafield on 23 January did not contravene any limit or condition contained in either of the authorisations granted by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and by my Department relating to the discharge of liquid waste containing radioactive materials by British Nuclear Fuels.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Manpower Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people were working in the National Health Service, local government, the Civil Service and nationalised industries in 1985; what was the total public expenditure on these services for the year; and if he will publish these numbers and costs both as a total and broken down between the four sectors mentioned.

Mr. MacGregor: Numbers employed (full-time equivalents) in the public sector at mid-1985 were as follows:

Central Government	Numbers (thousands)
NHS	1,026
Civil Service	596
HM Forces	326
Other	198
Local authorities	2,272
Public corporations:
Nationalised industries	1,124
Other (excluding trading funds)	117
Total	5,659

Public expenditure figures for 1985-86 are set out in detail in Cmnd. 9702—"The Government's Expenditure Plans 1996-87 to 1988-89".

Cash Limits (Revision)

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give revised cash limits for 1985-86 which take account of the decision by some Departments not to seek supplementary provision to cover the carry-forward allowed under the end-year flexibility schemes.

Mr. MacGregor: Under the end-year flexibility schemes announced in 1983, some 38 1985-86 cash limits were increased to allow for the carry-forward of underspend in 1984-85. In the case of four voted cash limits, the relevant Departments have not sought parliamentary approval for the extra provision in a Supplementary Estimate. In addition, one non-voted local authority capital cash limit does not now qualify in full for the earlier increase following later outturn information. To keep the control figures in line with provision, the cash limits are accordingly being reduced; a list is shown in the following table.

Revisions to 1985-86 cash limits resulting from the carry-forward of capital underspend in 1984-85 not being required: Voted cash limits

Class	Vote	Accounting Department	Description of expenditure	Current cash limit £000	Decrease £000	Revised cash limit £000
VI	4	Department of Transport	Driver and vehicle licensing	105,229	284	104,945
XIII	9	Department for National Savings	Economic and Financial administration	153,262	162	153,100
XIII	12	Her Majesty's Treasury	Central management of the Civil Service: computers and telecommunications	17,137	180	16,957
XVI	1	Welsh Office	Civil defence, tourism, roads and transport, housing, other environmental services, education and science, arts and libraries, and centrally funded health and personal social services, Wales	191,252	4,793	186,459
SO/LA1		Scottish Office	Capital expenditure in Scotland by local authorities on roads and transport, water and sewerage, general services, urban programme, police and social work, schools, further education and teacher training	415,749	5,359	410,390

VAT

Mr. Janner asked the Chancellor of the Exchquer what recent representations he has received about the value added tax burden on charities.

Mr. Brooke: Since April 1985 my colleagues and I have received some 370 representations about the value added tax burden on charities. These have been carefully considered but I cannot anticipate my right hon. Friend's Budget statement.

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Yeo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the proportion of gross domestic product represented by employers's national insurance contributions in 1985-86 or for the latest year for which figures are available; and what was the comparable figure in 1978-79.

Mr. MacGregor: The proportion of gross domestic product represented by employers' national insurance contributions fell from 4·6 per cent. to 3·7 per cent. between 1978-79 and 1984-85 (the latest year for which GDP figures are available). The figures include national insurance surcharge, (abolished during 1984-85) but exclude amounts recovered for statutory sick pay (introduced in 1983-84).

EFTPOS (Banking Law)

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any plans to seek to amend United Kingdom banking law as it relates to the interests of the personal customers of financial institutions using electronic funds transfer at point of sale.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Government propose to include in early legislation to strengthen the system of banking supervision a minor technical amendment to the Consumer Credit Act 1974. This will remove a possible constraint on the development of a nationwide system for electronic funds transfer at point of sale. The Government have no plans to include in this legislation any further amendments to UK banking law in relation to EFTPOS.

Banking Supervision (White Paper)

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has consulted the National Consumer Council about the proposals announced in annex 1, paragraph 5, of the White Paper "Banking Supervision".

Mr. Ian Stewart: The National Consumer Council is aware of the Government's proposals for amendment of the Consumer Credit Act, as set out in paragraph 5 of annex 1 of the White Paper "Banking Supervision" (Comnd 9695). The NCC have requested further details of the proposed amendment in relation to electronic funds transfer at point of sale, and these will be provided at the appropriate time.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each country in the European Economic Community the percentage value added tax take-up entailed by the budget approved by the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 4 March 1986, c. 94]: As laid down in article 203 of the treaty of Rome, the council's readings constitute stages in the process of agreeing a budget with the European Parliament, the other part of the budgetary authority. The VAT own resources rates to be applied to member states are only established when the budget is finally adopted by the European Parliament.

DEFENCE

Service Manpower

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the current shortages of manpower in each of the three armed services.

Mr. Lee: Overall the services have over 97 per cent. of their officer, and over 99 per cent. of their other ranks, trained strength requirements. The information broken down into each of the armed services is as follows:

Service Category	Shortfall (−) or Excess (+) in trained strength per cent.
Officers
Royal Navy	−3·0
Royal Marines	−3·9
Army	−1·9
RAF	−2·9
Total	−2·5
Other ranks
Royal Navy	+0·8
Royal Marines	−2·7
Army	+1·0
RAF	−3·1
Total	−0·3

BAOR

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total cost of the upkeep of the British Army in Germany during the last financial year.

Mr. Stanley: Outturn costs are not collected by geographical deployment areas, but table 2.3 of volume 2 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985" (Cmnd. 9430-II) shows provision over the period 1979-80 to 1985-86 for the British Army of the Rhine and Berlin.

Falkland Islands

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what has been the total cost to date arising from the Falkland Islands campaign at current prices;

(2) what has been the total military expenditure in the Falkland Islands since 1982.

Mr. Stanley: Total defence expenditure on the Falkland Islands up to the end of financial year 1985-86 is estimated to be £2·6 billion at current prices, including the cost of recovering the islands following the Argentine invasion, residual campaign costs since, and the extra cost to the defence budget of establishing and maintaining the garrison. Of this figure, campaign costs represent some £1·5 billion.

Gurkha Soldiers

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what provision is made for Christian Gurkha soldiers to worship during their recruit training at the training depot of the Brigade of Gurkhas in Hong Kong.

Mr. Lee: Gurkha soldiers serving in Hong Kong are able to worship at whatever church they wish. No special provision is made for Christians at the training depot of the Brigade of Gurkhas but there are two local Army churches, one Church of England and the other Roman Catholic, which they may attend.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the number of Gurkha soldiers serving with the British Army who received a compassionate discharge for each year since 1970; and on what grounds.

Mr. Lee: The information requested is as follows:

	Number
1970	—
1971	—
1972	1
1973	2
1974	4
1975	8
1976	3
1977	4
1978	6
1979	6
1980	6
1981	3
1982	3
1983	4
1984	6
1985	8

The grounds for discharge were domestic problems, involvement in legal or property disputes or further education requirements.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has as to the number of Gurkha soldiers at present serving with the British Army who have become Christians during their military service; and how many of these have changed their religious affiliation on their service documents.

Mr. Lee: One.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his reply on 28 February, Official Report, columns 709-10, if he will clarify the concept of improving the conditioning of intermediate level wastes; and whether this work is to be carried out at the Atomic Weapons Research Establishment, Aldermaston, or by a team from the establishment working elsewhere.

Mr. Lee: The work on improving the conditioning of intermediate level waste referred to is examining methods of treating such wastes and containing them within a possible depository. The work involves the nuclear industry, the Radiochemical Inspectorate of the Department of the Environment and the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate of the Health and Safety Executive. The Atomic Weapons Research Establishment, Aldermaston, is involved in aspects of this work, but there are no plans for a team from the establishment to do such work elsewhere.

Strategic Defence Initiative

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department was informed about the visit by Mr. Clarence Robinson, from the United States Department of Defence, to firms engaged in strategic defence initiative-related work in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: No official approach was made. I am informed that Mr. Robinson returned to the United States of America without visiting any United Kingdom companies.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what account was taken in negotiations leading to the conclusion of the memorandum of understanding on the strategic defence initiative between the United States Government and Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom of the application of territoriality to the exploitation of any research programmes which might result.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Full account was taken of this issue and the resulting arrangements satisfactorily safeguard United Kingdom interests.

Army Personnel (Statistics)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has as to the number of (a) Hindu, (b) Christian and (c) other Gurkhas serving with the British Army.

Mr. Lee: The information requested is as follows:

	Number
Hindu	7,893
Buddhis	297
Christian	16

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has as to the number of (i) Christian and (ii) Hindu: (a) commissioned and (b) non-commissioned officers serving with the British Army.

Mr. Lee: Excluding the Brigade of Gurkhas, the information requested is as follows:

	Numbers
Officers:
Christian	16,131
Hindu	33
Non-Commissioned Officers:
Christian	76,951
Hindu	28

Civil Defence

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give a further breakdown of the item "local administration communications etc. in United Kingdom" under "other support functions" in table 2.3 in the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985", Vol. 2.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 3 March 1986, c. 70-71]: The item includes the movement of service personnel and freight, HMSO and property repayment services, communications and other miscellaneous administration and support costs.

TRANSPORT

Commissioners of Irish Lights

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to his reply of 27 February, Official Report, column 649, he will now list the present country of residence of the members of the Commission of Irish Lights.

Mr. Ridley: I am not responsible for these appointments.

Motorways (Lighting)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the lengths in miles in each case of motorway and dual carriageway trunk road for which assurances have been given at public inquiries or at stages in the planning process that lighting would not take place.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost to the Department.

Traffic Surveying Equipment

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the locations of permanent automatic traffic counting installations; which of these are now in operation; what types of traffic measurements the installations can produce; how long it takes the measurement to become available for those requiring the information; and if he will place a copy of a technical report describing the monitoring method and programme in the Library.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall write to the hon. Member.

National Bus Company

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Transport what changes in the pattern of bus services he expects to follow the sale of the National Bus Company.

Mr. David Mitchell: The sale of NBC's operations will further the Government's policy of promoting fair competition in the bus industry. I believe this will give bus operators new incentives and the opportunity to provide the pattern of services which best responds to the wishes of passengers.

Security Tests (Plastic Pistols)

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to detect the presence of plastic pistols at airports and other security sensitive points for which he is responsible.

Mr. Ridley: My officials follow up all reports of the manufacture of such weapons with the Metropolitan police firearms branch. No operational firearm that is completely plastic or non-metallic has been identified to date. Such weapons as have been examined all have sufficient metal content to register on the metal detectors in use at United Kingdom airports. I am keeping the position under review, however.

Unlike most other states we search a significant proportion of passengers by hand at United Kingdom airports after they have passed through the metal detectors, and this acts as a deterrent against the carrying of realistic non-metallic replica firearms or other kinds of non-metallic patential weapons.

Derbyshire (Loss at Sea)

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) why a public inquiry has not been held into the disappearance at sea of the Derbyshire in 1980; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what consideration has been given by his Department to the existence of fatigue cracks in the Derbyshire and her five sister ships built between 1971 and 1976; what discussions have taken place with British Shipbuilders; and what advice is currently being given by his Department with a view to ensuring greater safety at sea and the avoidance of loss resulting from fatigue failures.

Mr. Ridley: I am awaiting a report concerning the disappearance at sea of the Derbyshire, and an announcement will be made shortly.

Light Dues

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about light dues.

Mr. Ridley: My Department has had extensive consultations with the three general lighthouse authorities (Trinity House, the Northern Lighthouse Board and the Commissioners of Irish Lights), the Lights Advisory Committee and—in respect of matters bearing on the Commissioners of Irish Lights—the Irish Department of Communications. In the light of these exchanges, I think it would be desirable if light dues in the United Kingdom in 1986-87 were increased by 5 per cent. and I have laid an order before the House for this purpose. The light dues to be levied by the Commissioners of Irish Lights in the Republic of Ireland are the responsibility of the Irish Minister of Communications.

I am conscious of the need to maintain the competitive position of our shipping industry and of our ports and, following my consultations with the general lighthouse authorities, I have asked them to reduce their expenditure by about £1·7 million in 1986-87.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of local government personnel in England in (a) education, (b) planning, (c) police, (d) fire services, (e) social services, (f) consumer services, (g) library and recreation and (h) other services, respectively, during the years 1960, 1970, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively; and what was the total cost in salaries and wages in each case.

Mrs. Rumbold: The available information is given in the table together with the notes.

Notes to the table

1. The manpower figures are from the "Joint Manpower Watch" as at June of each year and are given in terms of full-time equivalents. They are not available for 1960-61 or 1970-71.
2. Separate manpower figures are not available for consumer services. They are included in the manpower figures for other services.
3. The manpower costs include wages and salaries, employers' national insurance contributions, superannuation, allowances, training and other expenses. The 1960-61 figures are for England and Wales. For the remaining years they are for England. The 1984-85 figures are provisional.
4. Separate figures for the manpower cost of planning, consumer services and libraries, museums and recreation are not available for 1960-61. These items are in other services for that year.
5. Except as indicated in 2 and 4 above other services include local transport, housing (including housing revenue account) administration of justice, employment services, environmental services, miscellaneous rate fund services and trading services.
6. There are differences in the way in which the data sources attribute manpower and manpower cost figures to services. The cost figures do not therefore precisely relate to the manpower figures.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total amount paid in wages and salaries to all persons employed in local government in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983, respectively; if he will show the 1982 figure and the 1983 figure as percentages of the 1979 figure; and what information he has as to how much was paid in each case to (a) chief and senior officers and (b) all other personnel, excluding manual workers, and (c) manual workers, showing in each case 1982, 1983, 1984, and 1985 figures as a percentage of 1979 figures.

Mrs. Rumbold: The following is the available information on local authority employee costs in England:

	£ million	Percentage of 1979-80
1979-80	10,950	—
1980-81	13,510	—
1981-82	15,050	—
1982-83	16,180	148
1983-84	17,170	157
1984-85	18,230	166
1985-86	n.a.

The figures cover employee costs in rate fund services, trading services, and the housing revenue account, and include wages and salaries, national insurance, employers superannuation contributions and so on.

Outturn data held by the Department do not provide information on wages and salaries alone nor a breakdown of employee costs into (i) chief and senior officers (ii) manual workers, (iii) others.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state (a) the total expenditure on local government in 1979, 1984 and 1985 and (b) the average overall cost of local government staff; and if he will break down the average cost into pay, national insurance, personnel overheads, accommodation and rents, office services and superannuation and pension schemes and any other costs relating to staff for each year and (c) show the overall cost on staff as a percentage of total spending in each case.

Mrs. Rumbold: The available information is as follows:

	1979-80 England and Wales £ million	1984-85 England £ million
Gross revenue expenditure	25,265	36,740
Total employee costs	11,590 (46 percentage)	18,230 (50 percentage)

Total employee costs as a percentage of gross revenue expenditure are shown in brackets. Separate outturn information on wages and salaries, national insurance and the other elements specified in the question and estimates for 1985-86 are not available.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the capital expenditure for each of the facilities proposed for the disposal of low and intermediate level wastes, by shallow burial, engineered trench disposal and deep cavity disposal, in terms of gross capital expenditure for construction and yearly costs for operation, maintenance and servicing, staff and transport costs.

Mr. Waldegrave: I understand from NIREX that the likely capital costs of waste disposal plus the first 10 years of operation expressed in pounds at 1985 prices will be:

(a) Engineered trench burial for low level waste and short lived intermediate level waste: £100 million approx

(b) Deep cavity disposal for longlived intermediate level waste: £200 million approx

Actual costs will depend partly on the type of rock at the disposal site.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the total costs related to the disposal of unit volume of waste, for each of the waste types, showing the costs per cubic metre of very low level, low level, low activity intermediate level and high activity intermediate level radioactive wastes.

Mr. Waldegrave: I understand from NIREX that the estimated costs of waste disposal expressed as £ per annum per cubic metre at 1985 prices will be as follows, but detailed design studies have not been carried out.

Type of Waste	Transport by Road	Transport by Rail	Disposal
Low level	50	170	350
Short lived intermediate level	360	660	1,800
Long lived intermediate level	840	1,300	at least 2,000

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the non-nuclear industrial sites in England making authorised discharges of uranium and other radio-active materials to the sea.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The non-nuclear industrial sites in England which are authorised to discharge radioactive wastes to sea are listed below.

Name	Location
Albright and Wilson Limited	Marchon Works, Whitehaven, Cumbria
British Petroleum Chemicals Limited	Salt End, Hull, Humberside
British Titan Products (Tioxide) Limited	Grimsby, Humberside
Beeching Group plc	Worthing, West Sussex
Central Electricity Generating Board	Eggborough Power Station, Goole, North Yorkshire
Glaxochem Limited	Ulverston, Cumbria
Imperial Chemical Industries plc	Billingham, Cleveland
Imperial Chemical Industries plc	Severnside Works, Hallen, Bristol
Norsk Hydro Fertilizers Limited	West Site Tank Farm, Avonmouth, Bristol
Pfizer Limited	Sandwich, Kent
S C M Chemicals Limited	Stallinborough, Grimsby, Humberside

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the current discharge authorisations from British Nuclear Fuels Ltd., Sellafield, to the Irish sea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: As my right hon. Friend the Member for Woodford and Wanstead (Mr. Jenkin) informed the hon. Member on 18 December 1984 at columns 93-94, formal proposals to replace the existing liquid discharge authorisation for BNFL, Sellafield, are currently being prepared by the radiochemical inspectorate of my Department, jointly with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

It is now intended that, following the consultations which my right hon. Friend promised, the new liquid discharge authorisation should come into force on 1 July 1986.

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total expenditure by local authorities in England in each of the financial years since 1972-73 to the latest available date.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information is not available for England only for the period 1972-73 to date. Gross revenue expenditure of local authorities for England and Wales since 1972-73 is as follows:

	£ million
1972-73	8,004
1973-74	9,733
1974-75	11,734
1975-76	14,961
1976-77	17,133
1977-78	18,768
1978-79	21,410
1979-80	25,265
1980-81	30,338
1981-82	33,441
1982-83	36,142
1983-84	38,573
1984-85	38,735

Planning Decisions

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning decisions on applications by local authorities he has called in for his decision for each of the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Tracey: The information is as follows:

Year	Local authority proposals called in
1980	45
1981	22
1982	11
1983	22
1984	12
1985	*18

* Provisional figure: statistical returns on planning cases for 1985 are not yet complete.

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now revise his approach to controversial planning decisions where he is asked to consider the matter and where a considerable number of responsible people in an area wish him to undertake such consideration.

Mr. Tracey: The degree of controversy is one of the factors which my right hon. Friend takes into account in considering requests for his intervention on particular planning proposls. Each case is considered on its merits, but in general he is prepared to call in proposals only if planning issues of more than local importance arise.

Local Authorities (Planning Permission)

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning decisions by local authorities where they have granted themselves planning permission have been called in by him since he took office; how many have been reversed; and in how many cases he has refused to take action.

Mr. Tracey: Planning proposals by the local authority can only be called in by the Secretary of State before a decision is taken by the authority. However, provisional returns show that, in the period July-December 1985, six out of 20 local authority planning proposals required to be notified to my right hon. Friend were called in for his decision.

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will examine the present arrangements for checking decisions of local authorities who have power to grant themselves planning permission.

Mr. Tracey: The procedures under which my right hon. Friend considers whether the local planning authority shall be required to apply to him for permission for a development which it proposes to undertake are kept under review. They operate in a generally satisfactory manner.

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to provide that local authorities with planning permission powers use such powers only when they have taken specific steps to satisfy themselves that the interests of the local population have been protected; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: Local authorities are already required by the Town and Country Planning General Regulations 1976 to give their development proposals the same publicity and to carry out the same consultations as for any planning application for similar development. They are also obliged to consult any other local planning authority for the area in which the land concerned is situated.

Planning Applications

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many employees of his Department are engaged in examining and tendering advice on disputed planning applications; and how many have this work as their major employment role.

Mr. Tracey: The numbers of employees concerned are 695 and 555, respectively. These figures include 412 full-time inspectors and other staff, and 100 part-time fee-paid inspectors, dealing with planning and enforcement appeals to the Secretary of State.

School and Public Playing Fields

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many school and public playing fields have gone to public or private development in the most recent five-year period for which figures are available.

Mr. Tracey: This information is not available centrally.

NIREX

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress NIREX and its consultants have made with the design of the Land 2 disposal facilities; when the feasibility study, initial design stage and final design stages, respectively, are expected to be completed; and if he will make it his policy for each stage to be made public when it has been concluded.

Mr. Waldegrave: NIREX has already developed generic designs, illustrated in its third annual report. Alternative conceptual designs will be commissioned as relevant information from geological investigations of all the sites becomes available. These investigations will assess the feasibility of the sites and are expected to be complete during 1987. Thereafter, NIREX will undertake detailed design work. NIREX is prepared to make all designs publicly available. In particular, information on designs will be available to the public inquiry into any development proposals from NIREX and for consultation on the proposed terms of any authorisation for NIREX to dispose of waste at a facility.

British Nuclear Fuels Ltd.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to the answer of 31 January, Official Report, column 652, he has yet received an explanation from British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. as to why on Thursday 23 January it chose to discharge this material into the Irish sea in preference to any other options that may have been open to it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes; a report was received within two weeks of the event. I am satisfied that British Nuclear Fuels considered a number of options before discharging uranium-bearing liquid waste to the Irish sea, and that a safe and environmentally acceptable procedure was adopted.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the discharge from Sellafield on 23 January contravened in any respect any part of the authorisation limits for the site as they applied at the date of the discharge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am advised that the discharge from Sellafield on 23 January did not contravene any limit or condition contained in either of the authorisations granted by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and by my Department relating to the discharge of liquid waste containing radioactive materials by British Nuclear Fuels.

Delegations

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria he uses in deciding whether to meet delegations himself or to arrange for them to meet other Ministers in his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My hon. Friends and I try to meet as many delegations as possible. The decision as to who should meet a particular delegation is taken according to the circumstances of each case and in the light of our respective work loads and the special responsibilities of my hon. Friends.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many delegations Ministers have met following the rate support grant allocation for 1985-86, distinguishing in each case which Minister in his Department met each delegation.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Since announcing the 1986-87 rate support grant settlement on 18 December my ministerial colleagues and I have met 37 deputations from authorities. I have had discussions about rate support grant issues with representatives from the councils of Buckinghamshire, Dorset, Hereford and Worcester, Surrey, Kirklees, Leeds, Wakefield, Calderdale, Wirral, Sefton, Bury, Liverpool, Dudley, Solihull, Harborough, Winchester and East Hampshire. My hon. Friend the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government has met deputations from Hillingdon, the East Anglia Consultative Committee (which represents Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridgeshire), Essex, East Sussex, Hampshire, Hertfordshire, West Sussex and Cumbria. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State has met representatives from Barnet, Havering, Redbridge, Sutton, City of Durham, Langbaurgh, Ribble Valley, Burnley, East Yorkshire, Vale Royal, Kingswood, Thanet, Derbyside and Norfolk. She also met a deputation from North Tyneside with my noble Friend the Minister of State, and a deputation from the West Yorkshire police authority with my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw).

Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes to make any change to the cash limit for rate support grants to local authorities in England.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 2) 1985-86 was approved by the House of Commons on 20 January. It implements abatement of block grant for 1985-86 based on the latest information from local authorities on their budgeted expenditure. The total of grant abatement is reduced from £550 million to £435 million.

The cash limit for class XVIII, vote I, will be reduced by £30 million from £8,772 million to £8,742 million—which is broadly consistent with the above grant abatement. Expenditure on this vote is not classified as public expenditure.

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will arrange for tables to be placed in the Library showing the rate support grant paid to local authorities in respect of each year since 1974-75.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes. Two sets of tables have been placed in the Library: one set in respect of the years 1974-75 to 1980-81, the other for subsequent years. The two sets of figures are not fully comparable for reasons explained on the folders. The tables for 1983-84 onwards will be updated and later years will be added as information becomes available.

Green Field Sites

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning decisions taken by his Department since 2 September 1985 have had the effect of preventing the development of green field sites; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: This information is not readily available, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Allotments

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on which London borough councils provide allotments for local residents.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information that we have suggests that all London borough councils provide allotments with the exceptions of the inner London boroughs of Kensington and Chelsea, Tower Hamlets, Westminster and the City of London.

Conservation (Grants-in-Aid)

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, by category, grants-in-aid to the Countryside Commission and to the Nature Conservancy Council to encourage sound conservation practices in each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Grant-in-aid has been paid to the Countryside Commission only since 1 April 1982 as follows:

	£ million
1982-83	11·2
1983-84	12·5
1984-85	13·0
1985-86	15·3
1986-87*	17·7

* Proposed.

The commission has dual statutory purposes of conserving the natural beauty of the countryside and improving facilities for its enjoyment and it is not possible to identify the amounts spent on conservation practices. The commission's annual reports, copies of which are available in the Library, do however, give an indication of how their expenditure is broken down.

Grant-in-aid to the Nature Conservancy Council is paid in support of its conservation functions generally. The figures since 1979 are as set out:

	£ million
1979-80	7·9
1980-81	9·4
1981-82	10·2
1982-83	11·5
1983-84	12·8
1984-85	18·1
1985-86	22·7
1986-87*	32·1

* Proposed.

General Development Order

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to introduce legislation to amend the general development order; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: A number of changes to the general development orders came into force on 1 March. My right hon. Friend intends to lay before Parliament later this Session a new order which will consolidate, simplify and further amend the existing orders.

Consent Applications

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to reach decisions on all outstanding applications for consent under the Local Government Act 1985 by 31 March.

Mr. Tracey: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 21 January 1986, at column 142.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the number of outstanding applications for consent under the Local Government Act 1985 submitted by South Yorkshire county council; and how many have been outstanding for two months or more;

(2) what is the number of outstanding applications made by the Mersey county council for consent under the Local Government Act 1985; and how many have been outstanding for two months or more;

(3) what is the number of outstanding applications for consent under the Local Government Act 1985 submitted by Tyne and Wear county council; and how many have been outstanding for two months or more;

(4) what is the number of outstanding applications for consent under the Local Government Act 1985 submitted by West Yorkshire county council; and how many have been outstanding for two months or more;

(5) what is the number of outstanding applications for consent under the Local Government Act 1985 submitted by the West Midlands county council; and how many have been outstanding for two months or more;

(6) what is the number of outstanding applications for consent under the Local Government Act 1985 submitted by the Greater Manchester county council; and how many have been outstanding for two months or more.

Mr. Tracey: Details of outstanding applications for consent under section 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984, as amended by section 93 of the Local Government Act 1985, and sections 91 and 92 of the Local Government Act 1985, are set pout in the table:

Authority	Number of applications outstanding	Number of applications outstanding for 2 months or more
Greater Manchester Council	36	25
Merseyside County Council	6	0
South Yorkshire County Council	10	8
Tyne and Wear County Council	34	10
West Midlands County Council	29	13
West Yorkshire County Council	8	2

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many applications for consent under the Local Government Act 1985 made by the Greater London council have now been outstanding for more than two months; and if he will list them with the reasons for the delay in granting consent in each case.

Mr. Tracey: Fifty Eight current applications from the Greater London council for consent under section 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984, as amended by section 93 of the Local Government Act 1985 and sections 91 and 92 of the Local Government Act 1985, have been outstanding for over two months. A list of these applications is set out. This list could be provided in a more detailed form, with full reasons why decisions have not yet been issued, only at disproportionate cost. However, in at least 38 cases my right hon. Friend is awaiting further information requested from the council.

Urban Housing Renewal Unit (Report)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish his Department's urban housing renewal unit's report on its first six months' work.

Sir George Young: This account is a provisional working report to Ministers, which relates only to those authorities which had been visited by the unit before 19 December 1985. We will publish a full annual report during this summer.

Water Emergency Inquiry (Leeds)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received a copy of the Yorkshire water authority's report on the Leeds water emergency inquiry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I shall answer this question shortly.

Landscape Areas Special Development Orders

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his proposals for landscape areas special development orders following his consultation paper of April 1985.

Mr. Tracey: An announcement will be made very soon.

Open Flue Gas Heating Systems

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek to introduce grants for landlords, both public and private sector, to cover the cost of replacing open flue gas heating systems in bathrooms.

Sir George Young: Grants are already available, other than to housing authorities, for the replacement of such appliances under the home improvement grant system as part of an overall scheme of improvement and repair of a sub-standard dwelling. We have no plans to introduce any more specific grants. Where council dwellings are involved, replacement of such appliances would be primarily a matter for the local authority, and, where appropriate, work would be eligible for housing subsidy.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation obliging landlords, both public and private sector, to replace open flue gas heating systems in bathrooms.

Sir George Young: Responsibility for health and safety legislation in respect of gas water heaters is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General.

Kirklees and Wakefield Chamber of Commerce (Correspondence)

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will now reply to the letter and request of 5 February last addressed to him by Kirklees and Wakefield chamber of commerce about prospective local authority rate increases.

Mrs. Rumbold: I have answered this letter today.

Property in Lieu of Tax

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether any further property has been accepted in lieu of estate duty or capital transfer tax.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Yes. Two sites have recently been accepted under these arrangements. One hundred and five acres at Coldharbour common, Dorking—in one of the most outstanding areas of the Surrey hills area of outstanding natural beauty—have been accepted and transferred to the National Trust.

In addition, 41 acres of woodland at Pond Wood, Buckinghamshire, within the Chilterns AONB, have been accepted and transferred to the Chequers estate.

The net cost was £61,500 (£12,500 for Coldharbour common and £49,000 for Pond Wood) and this was borne equally on the vote of my Department and that of the Office of Arts and Libraries.

Highway Maintenance (Bromley)

Mr. John Hunt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he can now say how he proposes to deal with the issue raised by the London borough of Bromley regarding the level of grant payment for the upkeep of the highways to be transferred from the Greater London council to Bromley after abolition.

Mr. Waldegrave: I intend to deal with this matter in the first supplementary report for 1986-87 later this year. I intend then (a) to redetermine settlement multipliers for London boroughs to allow for the revised disaggregation of highway maintenance expenditure based on inherited road lengths and road usage; and (b) to redetermine multipliers to limit the grant losses faced by ratepayers arising from this change to the equivalent of a 2p rate. This is a temporary arrangement and will be removed in a subsequent supplementary report for 1986-87.

These changes will mean that Bromley will receive the proper amount of grant for taking over responsibility for highway maintenance in Bromley from the GLC.

Details of the redetermined multipliers, before the application of the limit on grant losses, are shown in the table. I am consulting the local authority associations about the basis for calculating the safety net.

Written Answers to Questions

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Middlesex Guildhall

Mr. Lawrence asked the Attorney-General what work is being carried out on the Middlesex Guildhall building in Parliament square; whether it is intended to reopen it as a Crown court; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The interior of the Middlesex Guildhall is being adapted in order to increase the number of courtrooms from six to seven and to improve the facilities available to the courts' users. The work is expected to be completed by the end of 1987 and it will reopen as a Crown court thereafter.

Law Commission Reports (Draft Bills)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Attorney-General on how many occasions draft Bills contained in reports of the Law Commission have been prepared by parliamentary counsel; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: All clauses and draft Bills included in reports by the Law Commission are prepared by parliamentary counsel. There have been 81 such reports to date.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Inflation

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last met the Confederation of British Industry to discuss the current level of inflation.

Mr. Ian Stewart: My right hon. Friend last saw the CBI at the NEDC meeting on 5 March, but inflation was not discussed. With the current downward trend it is understandable that the CBI has not asked for such a discussion.

Tax Allowances

Mr. Cash asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received seeking special tax allowances or relief for individuals who work in United Kingdom enterprises which compete successfully with foreign goods or services.

Mr. Moore: We have received representations on a wide range of issues in recent weeks. I have noted my hon. Friend's interest in this particular suggestion.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will express the value of personal tax allowances to a single person, married couple and two wage earners tax unit at each of the marginal rates of tax.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the scheme for the direct payment of value added tax by the buyers as opposed to the vendors of gold was introduced; if Johnson Matthey Bankers and the Bank of England have participated continuously and jointly in the scheme since its inception; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The scheme was introduced on 1 November 1983. The Commissioners of Customs and Excise advise me that Johnson Matthey Bankers Ltd. was issued with a letter of authority to use the scheme from its inception. However, to disclose the extent of a company's use of the scheme would be a breach of the commissioners' normal principle of confidentiality governing the affairs of an individual taxpayer.

As a central bank it is not appropriate for the Bank of England to be a member of the scheme.

Taxation

Mr. Frank Field asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will express the percentage shares of tax paid for each year since 1977-78 by the following income groups: the top 10 per cent., 10 to 20 per cent., 20 to 30 per cent., 30 to 40 per cent., 40 to 50 per cent., 50 to 60 per cent., 60 to 70 per cent., 70 to 80 per cent., 80 to 90 per cent. and bottom 10 per cent., respectively;

(2) if he will express, in percentage terms, changes in the combined effect of tax and national insurance contributions in 1978-79, and the latest available date, taking 1956-57 tax year as the base for those on two-thirds average earnings, average earnings, twice, five and 10 times average earnings.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Frank Field asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will detail the value of mortgage interest relief at the latest available date, giving the average relief per mortgagor, the numbers claiming relief, the total value of relief and the total number of taxpayers per income range for those with incomes under £3,000, £3,000 to £5,000, £5,000 to £7,500, £7,500 to £10,000, £10,000 to £15,000, £15,000 to £20,000, £20,000 to £25,000 and above £25,000.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Gaston Schloh (European Court Judgment)

Mr. Jackson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the United Kingdom is implementing the Court of Justice judgment in the Gaston Schloh case (85/82).

Mr. Brooke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Bad Debts (VAT)

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the provisions for extended relief from value added tax on bad debts arrangements introduced by the Finance Act 1985 will be brought into operation; and whether they will apply to any existing receiverships.

Mr. Brooke: A Treasury commencement order has been made and Value Added Tax (Bad Debt Relief) Regulations are being laid today before the House to bring the provisions of section 32 of the Finance Act 1985 into operation from 1 April next. The legal provisions will apply only where the debtor becomes insolvent on or after 1 April. Customs and Excise will, however, allow relief as an extra-statutory class concession where, on that date, the debtor is already in receivership provided that the receiver is able to issue a certificate that the assets of the company would be insufficient, on liquidation, to cover the payment of a dividend to the ordinary unsecured creditors. Concessionary relief will also be allowed in similar circumstances in Northern Ireland pending the introduction of equivalent legislation for the Province.

ENERGY

North Sea Oil and Gas

Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he proposes to take any action within the ambit of his responsibility by meeting the appropriate trade unions and organisations to discuss the threatened industrial dispute in the North sea oil industry.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I understand that this matter is still under discussion between the employers and trade unions concerned. It would be inappropriate for me to intervene.

Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the oil companies and contractors involved onshore and offshore in North sea gas and oil exploration.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The latest published list of United Kingdom offshore licensees is given in appendix 2 of the annual report for the year 1984-85 published in accordance with the Continental Shelf Act 1964. I will write to the hon. Member with the information requested on onshore licensees. There is no list available of the many thousands of contractors involved in United Kingdom onshore and offshore oil and gas operations.

Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many times he has met the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association (UKOOA) from the beginning of 1985 to the present time.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My right hon. Friend and I frequently meet representatives of UKOOA both formally and informally, and will continue to do so, to discuss the many matters of mutual interest.

Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State of Energy what consultations his Department has had with operators in the North sea in relation to current health and safety practices.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: As required under legislation, my Department is holding formal consultations with North sea operators, on a number of matters including first aid, safety representatives and safety committees, reporting of accidents and various training guidance notes.

ENVIRONMENT

Land Management Agreement Payments

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much the Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission have spent in cash and real terms on land management agreement payments to farmers for each year since 1980.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Nature Conservancy Council has paid the following amounts under management agreements with owners and occupiers of sites of special scientific interest:

	Amounts paid £	Expressed in 1980-81 prices £
1980-81	*39,018	39,018
1981-82	*60,550	54,994
1982-83	243,000	206,207
1983-84	361,000	293,238
1984-85	1,145,000	889,929

* Amounts paid under nature reserve agreements are not readily available for these years and are excluded. Such amounts are usually small but one payment in 1981-82 under a nature reserve agreement amounted to £278,734.

It is not possible to identify separately payments made to farmers. The Countryside Commission does not make payments direct to farmers under management agreements.

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the average cost in inner city areas per unit of accommodation of (a) housing management and (b) housing repairs and maintenance for local authority housing.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

Croxteth Hall and Country Park

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the Liverpool city council and the chairman of the Merseyside Residuary Body on the future of Croxteth hall and country park; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: My noble Friend the Minister of State has had discussions with representatives of Liverpool city council about the future management arrangements for Croxteth. These are not matters for the chairman of the Merseyside Residuary Body.

It is disappointing that the city council, to which the estate was originally given and which has received an allowance for it in its RSG settlement for 1986-87, has not yet made known its intentions for the continuing and proper management of this important local amenity and so end the uncertainty of the staff.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will visit the Croxteth hall and country park in Liverpool before making a property order under the Local Government Act 1985.

Mr. Tracey: The property order transferring the Croxteth estate to Liverpool city council has already been made.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is taking to secure the full adoption of the facilities of Croxteth hall and country park as required under section 7(2) of the Local Government Act 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: I refer the hon. Member to the report under section 7(2) of the Local Government Act 1985, which was laid before the House on 25 February. This describes the steps taken by my right hon. Friend, including the provison of extra resources to the successor authorities and the Countryside Commission.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will be replying to the letter of 11 February 1986 from the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby with reference to Croxteth hall and country park, Liverpool.

Mr. Tracey: A reply was sent on 5 March.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the representations he has received about the future of the Croxteth hall and country park in Liverpool; what discussions he has had with representatives of the local community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: I refer the hon. Member to my replies of 28 October 1985, at column 368, and of 11 February 1986, at column 400.

Voluntary Sector (Local Authority Support)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the 10 local authorities, in order, providing the greatest level of support for the voluntary sector.

Mrs. Rumbold: The 10 local authorities, in order, providing the greatest level of support for the voluntary sector are as follows:

	£ thousand
GLC	29,663
Islington	13,348
Kent	11,775
Birmingham	11,413
Lancashire	9,450
Hackney	9,175
Southwark	8,777
Lambeth	8,398
Surrey	7,549
Avon	7,196

The figures provided are for 1984-85 and include amounts paid in grants, fees and rate relief. These figures are available from "Charity Statistics 1984-85" compiled and published by the Charities Aid Foundation.

Chemical Leak, Belvedere

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received any representations following the recent chemical leak at Belvedere.

Mrs. Rumbold: I shall answer this question shortly.

Urban Programme

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the total sums allocated by the Government to the urban aid programme for the years 1979 to 1985.

Sir George Young: Resource allocations, in cash, for the urban programme were as follows:

	£ million
1979-80	165
1980-81	202
1981-82	215
1982-83	270
1983-84	348
1984-85	348
1985-86	338

Homes Insulation Grants (Camden)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if any application has been received from the London borough of Camden for supplementary grant under the 1985-86 homes insulation grant programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: No application has been received from the London borough of Camden for an additional allocation under the homes insulation scheme. Local authorities were informed in DOE circular 7/85, issued in March 1985, that in addition to an initial allocation which had been made to individual local authorities, a reserve of £7 million had been established from which further allocations would be made in accordance with demand. Authorities were asked to apply in time to maintain their flow of approvals and to avoid their having to impose a moratorium on approvals. Many local authorities have applied for such additional allocations.

Norfolk Broads

Mr. Ryder asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will introduce legislation to establish a new authority for the Norfolk Broads.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Yes. The Government intend to introduce a Bill to set up a new statutory authority, with powers for the comprehensive management of the Broads, at the earliest practicable opportunity.

This is a nationally important area for landscape, nature conservation and recreation. We are convinced that if the steady decline of its ecology is to be reversed, the arrangements for managing the land and water resources of this unique area must be put on a durable statutory basis. The Government have therefore decided to give priority to legislation to this end, following advice to the local authorities wishing to promote such legislation that it is not suitable for introduction as a private Bill.

Subject to parliamentary approval of the Bill, the new authority will take over the existing powers of the present non-statutory Broads authority, and powers to control navigation over most of the Broads rivers system on 1 April 1988.

Water Emergency Inquiry (Leeds)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received a copy of the Yorkshire water authority's report on the Leeds water emergency inquiry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 6 March 1986, c. 279]: I have received a copy of the report by the committee of inquiry on the Leeds water emergency of last December, which was published on 27 February 1986. The board of the Yorkshire water authority met on that day to consider the report and agreed an eleven-point action programme in accordance with the report's recommendations. I welcome the comprehensive and frank nature of the report which commends the way the burst main was repaired and the measures taken by the authority, with assistance from others, to minimise loss of water supplies to consumers, but reveals shortcomings in maintenance and in emergency procedures. The chairman of the Yorkshire water authority has assured me that the lessons emerging from this incident will be fully learnt and applied.

WALES

Youth Training

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many young people in Wales who have followed Manpower Services Commission YTSs, as a percentage of the total number each year since their inception, have found full-time employment.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information is not available on this basis. Until October 1985 the only information available came from a 15 per cent. sample survey of leavers between July and September 1984. This showed that three months after leaving, 49 per cent. had entered full-time employment. Since July 1985 a monthly 100 per cent. follow-up is carried out, the first survey results being available in October 1985. The results were as follows:

Month of leaving	Percentage in a full-time job
April and May 1985	43
April to June 1985	43
April to July 1985	45
April to August 1985	47
April to September 1985	46

Training and Employment

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many of the long-term unemployed people who have been on Manpower Services Commission schemes in (a) Gwynedd and (b) Wales have subsequently found full-time employment in each year since the schemes inception.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Available information relates to Wales as a whole and is contained in the MSC's second community programme follow-up survey, of November 1985, which covered entrants to the scheme between April and June 1983. This indicated that 21 per cent. of participants in Wales left to go straight into full-time employment.

Rates

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what percentage increase in domestic rates, on average, a household of (a) one adult, (b) two adults, (c) three adults and (d) four adults in Wales would face if the recommendations of the Green Paper "Paying For Local Government" were implemented;

(2) what percentage increase in domestic rates, on average, a household of (a) one adult, (b) two adults, (c) three adults and (d) four adults in Gwynedd would face if the recommendations of the Green Paper "Paying For Local Government" were implemented.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Had the transition to the proposed new system of local government finance begun in 1984-85 each adult would have been assumed to pay a community charge of £50. The yield from the charge would have been used to cut domestic rate bills by about half or approximately £100 per domestic hereditament.

Had the community charge replaced domestic rates entirely in 1984-85 the average charge per adult would have been £105.

The impact of the changes on households of different size, at the Wales level, is shown in tables 1 and 2. The effect of the changes in Gwynedd alone is shown in tables 3 and 4.

All the tables illustrate the impact of the proposed changes had they occurred in 1984-85. The local tax figures shown are before rebates: those on low incomes would receive assistance with their local tax bills. In the case of Gwynedd the figures reflect the impact of the safety net grant at the local authority level.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he supports the European Commission proposal to introduce the switching between the European Commission member states of multi-fibre arrangement quotas.

Mr. Alan Clark: I consider that it is necessary to introduce some greater degree of flexibility between the quotas of individual member states than in the past, taking into account the pressure for such flexibility from developing countries and the need to move towards the creation of an internal market.

Foreign-owned Companies

Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the contribution to the British economy of foreign-owned British companies in terms of investment and the provision of employment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The contribution is significant. Available statistics relate to manufacturing industry only. The most recent figures are for 1982. Foreign-owned enterprises were only 2·27 per cent. of all enterprises, yet their capital expenditure represented 24·7 per cent. of the total and they provided 14·7 per cent. of total employment. Capital expenditure per employee in foreign-owned companies was nearly double that in United Kingdom-owned companies. These figures clearly illustrate the important role played by foreign-owned companies in our economy. The Government will continue to encourage beneficial inward investment into the United Kingdom.

Soviet Union (Fissile Material Exports)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the five-year economic and industrial trade agreement recently concluded with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics includes provision for the export of fissile materials.

Mr. Alan Clark: The UK/USSR economic and industrial co-operation programme for the years 1986 to 1990 includes a reference to the enrichment of raw uranium in the USSR for British customers. This involves the temporary export of nuclear materials under licence. Both the enriched product and depleted remainder are returned to the United Kingdom.

Postal Franking Machines

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the report of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on postal franking machines is to be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The report is published today.

The commission found that the market shares of Pitney Bowes and Roneo Alcatel constituted a monopoly situation in relation to the supply, maintenance and repair of postal franking machines. Despite entry into the market by other suppliers in recent years, the two companies still jointly retained 81 per cent. by volume of the market for new machines and 93 per cent. of the maintenance market.

The commission also found that Pitney Bowes, the dominant supplier of the two companies and the price leader, was enjoying comfortable profits, and that price competition from other companies in the market was affected by its market leadership. Prices of postal franking machines has stayed well ahead of those for office machines generally and of the retail prices index and, in the commission's view, were higher than they needed to be or would be in conditions of more effective competition. The commission judged that the practice of Roneo Alcatel and Pitney Bowes of failing to provide customers with price lists also helped to restrain price competition and to focus it on selected discounts for the more insistent bargainers.

The commission noted that the Post Office imposes strict conditions on the design, use and maintenance of postal franking machines in order to protect its revenues from fraud or machine malfunction. However, the commission found that these conditions had the effect of preventing distribution through independent dealers as an alternative to direct selling by the machine suppliers, the development of any alternative maintenance services and a market for second-hand equipment.

The commission concluded that the pricing policies and certain other practices of Roneo Alcatel and Pitney Bowes taken together with certain Post Office regulations and practices have the effect of inhibiting competition.

The commission rejected as a remedy measures to regulate the companies' prices which, it concluded, might harm the smaller competitors and newer entrants to the market. Instead, it suggested that the Post Office be invited to change certain of its requirements; that assurances be sought from Roneo Alcatel and Pitney Bowes to remedy the uncompetitive practices identified in the report; and to open the market to approved dealers and maintenance organisations.

I accept the findings of this report. I am consequently asking the Director General of Fair Trading to hold discussions with the Post Office with a view to securing changes in its present regulations and practices to provide for some authorisation of independent maintenance sources and dealers in both new and second-hand machines and for relaxation of inspection specifications. I am also asking him to seek appropriate undertakings from Pitney Bowes plc and Roneo Alcatel to remedy the uncompetitive practice identified in the report and to open the market to authorised dealers and maintenance operators: notably on the provision of price lists; the supply of spare parts to third party suppliers and maintainers of machines; the maintenance requirements imposed on those buying and leasing machines; and on the ability of the leasing companies of machines to dispose of machines otherwise than by return to the original suppliers.

The commission drew attention to the need for the management of the two companies to maintain vigilance to prevent sales malpractices on the part of their salesmen. I attach great importance to such vigilance, and trust that if any such malpractices occur in the future the managements will take appropriate action against any of their staff who permit or use such tactics.

International Tin Council

Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the current situation in the tin market.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government regret that the protracted negotiations between the International Tin Council and its bank and broker creditors have now broken down, without reaching agreement to resolve the tin crisis.

We have constantly made it clear, following suspension by the ITC of its operations in the tin market on 24 October last with gross commitments exceeding £800 million, that the United Kingdom was prepared to accept its share of the liabilities of the ITC, and we called on all other members to do likewise.

It is especially unfortunate that the breakdown of negotiations has come at a time when substantial progress had been made towards resolving the tin crisis in an orderly fashion. Had the ITC member countries collectively shown a greater sense of urgency and responsibility from the outset, a solution might have been found. Discussions between members of the EC were protracted and formal negotiations by the ITC began only at the end of January. However, the final breakdown of negotiations was caused by the refusal of some producer countries to accept the proposals.

At this late stage it seems unlikely that a settlement can now be reached in order to secure a return to orderly trading in tin. If a substantial number of other ITC countries are prepared to make a new effort to resolve the crisis, the Government would, of course, be willing to join such discussions. But it must be clear, as it has been throughout the earlier discussions and negotiations, that the United Kingdom Government are not prepared alone to take over the responsibility for the ITC's debts.

The Government deplore the failure of certain other Governments to agree to meet their share of the commitments of the ITC. This failure undermines good faith and integrity in international financial dealings.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Farmers (Conservation and Amenity Payments)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will itemise in cash and real terms Government payments to farmers for conservation and amenity proposals for each year since 1979.

Mr. Jopling: It is not possible to isolate all those payments made by agricultural departments to farmers which are of benefit to the conservation and enhancement of the natural beauty and amenity of the countryside.

Certain elements can, however, be identified. Farm capital grant expenditure in the United Kingdom on stone walls, shelter belts, hedges, waste disposal and bracken control amounted to £4,974,121 in 1985. This does not cover all the expenditure under the capital grants schemes which could be regarded as being environmentally beneficial.

In addition, farmers participating in the Broads grazing marshes conservation scheme received payments totalling £418,348·95 in 1985. Half of this sum was funded by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the remainder by the Countryside Commission.

Payments have also been made under other schemes which have a range of objectives. The conservation element of this expenditure cannot, however, be separatley identified.

I cannot, of course, comment on the payments which may have been made to farmers for conservation works by other Government Departments, local authorities or grant-in-aid bodies.

Liverpool (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Parry asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will made a statement on the recent visit to Liverpool by the Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer).

Mr. Gummer: I visited Liverpool, at the invitation of the United Kingdom Seed Crushing and Oil Processing Association, to see its long-established edible oil industry. I was pleased to note the substantial investment in modernising this industry which has recently taken place in order to help secure its future.

PRIME MINISTER

Research and Development

Mr. Soames asked the Prime Minister what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to improve the co-ordination of Government spending on research and development.

The Prime Minister: Steps to improve the co-ordination of Government spending on research and development are regularly considered by the Chief Scientific Adviser, Cabinet Office, by departmental chief scientists and, as appropriate, by Ministers.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on co-ordination between the Department of the Environment and the Department of Energy on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the disposal of nuclear waste.

The Prime Minister: Policy on civil radioactive waste management is a matter for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment, Scotland and Wales. They do, however, consult closely with the Secretary of State for Energy in view of his responsibilities for the nuclear and electricity generating industries, which generates much of the waste and which are responsible for dealing with their wastes in accordance with the Government's stated policy.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Hong Kong

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to what extent representatives of Christian and other religious organisations are allowed access to detainees in the closed camps in Hong Kong; and what conditions are imposed upon them.

Mr. Renton: Representatives of the Christian churches and of any other religions professed by the residents of Hong Kong's closed camps may visit freely and may hold religious services for those who wish them. Whilst no formal restrictions are imposed upon these visits, proselytising is firmly discouraged by the Hong Kong Government, who are responsible for the management of the camps.

South Africa

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment Her Majesty's Government made of the current situation in South Africa before deciding to call upon the Government of South Africa to lift the state of emergency prevailing in certain magisterial districts of the Republic; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: We are glad that President Botha has felt able to announce the lifting of the state of emergency, a step for which we had called together with out partners in Europe and the Commonwealth. We believe this should help to reduce tension and encourage prospects for dialogue. We shall continue to follow developments in South Africa closely.

Western European Union

Mr. Coleman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what new posts have been created within the Secretariat-General of the Western European Union and within other organs of the Western European Union since the Rome declaration of October 1984; what responsibilities and salaries these posts carry; which of them have been filled and by whom; by what means new staff are being recruited; and what steps are being taken to keep (a) Parliament and (b) the Assembly of the Western European Union, informed of such developments occurring in the course of the Western European Union reinvigoration process.

Mr. Eggar [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1986, c. 242]: We are now able to supply the following information:

Belgium: 3
Federal Republic of Germany: 4
Luxembourg: 1
United Kingdom: 2
France: 4
Italy: 3
Netherlands: 2.

The overall effect of recent changes on personnel in London is a reduction of one hors-grade (assistant secretary-general) post and one former A-grade post balanced by the creation of the four new A-grade posts.

The overall effect on WEU personnel of recent changes in Paris is the creation of one new director and a reduction of six A-grade officials.

Vacancy notices are issued to the national representatives in the Permanent council for onward transmission to their capitals; they are also sent where appropriate to other international organisations. Contracts for employment will in principle be of short-term duration in the first instance in view of the transitional period which extends to the end of December 1987.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Prisoners (Searches)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many strip searches were made of female prisoners in Her Majesty's prison, Armagh, in February; if he will give the number of persons involved and the number of times each person was searched; whether any prison contraband, smuggled item or illegal correspondence was discovered in any search, indicating which items; in how many cases prisoners refused to be searched and had to be restrained while the search was being conducted; and if he will indicate the reasons for the search, namely, making an appearance at Armagh courthouse on remand, attending trial, inter-prison visit or other reasons.

Mr. Scott: During February 1986, a total of 29 searches were carried out on 18 prisoners; eight prisoners were searched once, nine were searched twice, and one prisoner was searched on three occasions. No prohibited article was found during these searches and no prisoner refused to be searched. Searches were carried out in the following circumstances:

	Number of searches
First admission or remand or whilst awaiting trial	3
First admission on sentence or on final discharge	21
Attending Armagh Remand Court	Nil
Attending other remand courts	2
Bail Court appearances	1
Appeal Court appearances	1
Visits to outside hospital	1
Total	29

Cervical Smear Tests

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the provision of cervical smear tests in each health area in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: Cervical smears are tested at three centres in Northern Ireland. Some of the smears taken in the Western board area are tested at the Altnagelvin hospital laboratory. The remainder and all smears taken in the Northern, Southern and Eastern board areas are processed by the Eastern board. Most routine screening smears for cervical cancer are tested at the Belfast city hospital laboratory. The remaining screening smears, together with diagnostic smears, are processed at the Royal Victoria hospital laboratory.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement explaining the reasons for the delay in re-starting smear tests in Northen Ireland and outlining what measures aimed at improving provisions of such tests have been taken during this delay.

Mr. Needham: An eight-week moratorium was applied from the beginning of 1986—not on the testing of smears but on the taking of routine screening smears. The testing of cervical smears taken up to the end of December 1985 has not ceased at any time. The moratorium on taking of routine smears has been extended to the end of April as the Eastern board was unable, during the original eight-week period, to reduce the backlog to a manageable level. Additional funds have been made available to cover the cost of overtime working and for the recruitment of extra laboratory staff to process smears.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement outlining what financial, technical, medical staff, clerical, publicity and other resources are to be given to the provision of smear tests in Northern Ireland, indicating how these commitments compare with provision prior to the suspension of tests.

Mr. Needham: Arrangements are being made to provide additional laboratory accommodation in the Northern, Southern and Eastern board areas. Funds have already been allocated for additional consultants who will be involved in processing cervical screening smears. Extra medical laboratory scientific staff have been recruited. A further £50,000 has been provided for improvements to the service in the coming financial years.

Work is continuing to assess the full financial, computer and staffing implications of having in place by 1988 a comprehensive computerised call and recall system, together with adequate staffing and laboratory back-up, for cervical cancer screening. Additional health education and publicity will be provided as necessary to ensure maximum use of the expanded service, which should about double the present capacity.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many women are presently on the waiting list for smear tests in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: On 28 February there were 9,500 women in Northern Ireland waiting for the results of of tests on smears already taken. No list is kept of women waiting to have smears taken.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will estimate how long it will take to work through the backlog of smear tests which has built up before and during the suspension, and outlining what special measures are being taken to facilitate the processing of the backlog of cases.

Mr. Needham: It is estimated that the current backlog of smears awaiting testing should be cleared by the end of April. Additional laboratory staff are being recruited to enable the service to deal with a greater number of smears.

Compensation Payments

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish in the Official Report a table giving the amount in 1985 of compensation payment made under the Criminal Damage (Compensation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1977 and earlier legislation.

Mr. Scott: The amount of compensation paid in 1985 was £16,807,617.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the estimated cost of the Royal Ulster Constabulary in the financial year 1985-86, giving separately figures for (a) salary and benefits, (b) transport and communication, (c) new construction, (d) other costs, (e) total gross expenditure and (f) total net expenditure after deduction of receipts.

Mr. Scott: The estimated cost of the Royal Ulster Constabulary in the financial year 1985-86 is set out in the table:

1 April 1985 to 31 March 1986

	£ million
A. Salary and benefits	237·7
B. Transport and communications	14·6
C. New construction	8·4
D. Other costs	36·1
E. Total gross expenditure	296·8
F. Total net expenditure after deductions of receipts	277·6

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has on the extent of intimidation of members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and their families, particularly from loyalists hostile to the Anglo-Irish agreement; and how such intimidation is being countered.

Mr. Scott: Since the Anglo-Irish agreement was signed in November, 17 cases of intimidation of members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve living in predominantly Protestant areas have been recorded.

In areas where intimidation has taken place, the police have increased their level of patrolling to provide vulnerable members of the force and their families with protection and reassurance. In addition, a special headquarters unit has been set up to monitor the situation and to assist the personnel involved in every way possible, including removal to new homes.

Prisoners

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give details of the number of prisoners in prison in Northern Ireland as at 31 December 1984 and 1985, detailing the numbers by sex, in prison and in young offenders centres separately.

Mr. Scott: On 30 December 1984 and 29 December 1985 there were 2,038 and 1,861 prisoners, respectively, in Northern Ireland prison establishments. These figures include remand prisoners.

Autocrime

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects the number of persons proceeded against for offences in relation to the taking of motor vehicles without their owner's consent in 1985 to become available.

Mr. Scott: The number of persons proceeded against for the unauthorised taking of motor vehicles in Northern Ireland in 1985 was 615.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many vehicles were recovered in each police division in Northern Ireland in 1985.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 February 1986, c. 728]: The information is as follows:

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

National Advisory Body (Ministerial Letter)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will place in the Library a copy of his letter of 14 October 1985 to the chairman of the Committee of the National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher Education.

Mr. Walden: Yes.

Royal Greenwich Observatory

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what evidence he has received about the condition of the clocks at the Royal Greenwich Observatory on which the Greenwich time signal is based; what is the estimated remaining life of the clocks; and what is the likely cost of their replacement.

Mr. Walden: It is estimated that the six atomic clocks at the Royal Greenwich Observatory will fail within the next three years. To replace them would cost about £40,000 per clock, and to maintain the independent time scale would cost about £100,000 per annum in manpower and equipment. The need for an independent atomic time service is greatly reduced by the availability of the international atomic time scale by satellite, and the observatory proposes to obtain reference to precise time by this means in future. This will involve about £40,000 in capital equipment, and about £20,000 per annum running costs.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are his plans for the continuation of the Greenwich time signal in the event of the failure of the clocks at the Royal Greenwich Observatory on which it depends.

Mr. Walden: The need for the Royal Greenwich Observatory to maintain an independent atomic time scale has been greatly reduced by the availability of the international atomic time scale (UTC) via the Navstar—global positioning system (GPS) satellite service. When the clocks fail, the Observatory will continue to assist in the provision of the familiar "six-pips" Greenwich time signal by reference to the UTC.

Teachers' Superannuation Scheme

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what implications the judgment of the European Court of Justice in the Marshall case has for the future of the teacher superannuation scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made clear on 3 March, at columns 52-53, the judgment of the European Court of Justice in the case of Miss Helen Marshall was concerned with the age at which she must leave work rather than with eligibility for retirement pension. There are therefore no implications for the teachers' superannuation scheme.

High Energy Particle Physics

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science on what date he intends to announce his response to recommendations of the inquiry into high energy particle physics in the United Kingdom chaired by Sir John Kendrew.

Mr. Walden: I cannot add further to my replies of 4 and 21 February at columns 114 and 355-56, to my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor).

HOME DEPARTMENT

Vietnamese Refugees

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Vietnamese refugees with close relatives living in the United Kingdom were granted admission to the United Kingdom in the last 12 months for which figures are available prior to the change in criteria applied to all refugees, stipulating that normally only the spouse and minor children will be admitted.

Mr. Waddington: In the 12 months from May 1980 to April 1981, 1,230 dependants were accepted for admission and 390 were refused. These figures include a small number of Laotians and Kampucheans.

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has of the potential number of relatives of Vietnamese refugees settled here who might wish to enter the United Kingdom for family reunification purposes.

Mr. Waddington: It is not possible to make a reliable estimate.

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many grandparents of Vietnamese refugees settled in the United Kingdom have applied, or in respect of whom application has been made, for family reunification in the last 12 months for which figures are available; how many have been granted admission; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many spouses of Vietnamese refugees settled in the United Kingdom have applied, or in respect of whom application has been made, for family reunification in the last 12 months for which figures are available; how many have been granted admission; and if he will make a statement;

(3) how many parents of Vietnamese refugees settled in the United Kingdom have applied, or in respect of whom application has been made, for family reunification in the last 12 months for which figures are available; how many have been granted admission; and if he will make a statement;

(4) how many siblings of Vietnamese refugees settled in the United Kingdom have applied, or in respect of whom application has been made, for family reunification in the last 12 months for which figures are available; how many have been granted admission; and if he will make a statement;

(5) how many children of Vietnamese refugees settled in the United Kingdom have applied, or in respect of whom application has been made, for family reunification in the last 12 months for which figures are available; how many have been granted admission; and if he will make a statement;

Mr. Waddington: I regret that this information is not available.

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Vietnamese persons who have close relatives living in the United Kingdom have applied, or in respect of whom application has been made, for family reunification in the period of the last 12 months for which figures are available; how many have been allowed to come to the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: In 1985 applications in respect of about 950 persons were received. In the same period applications (not necessarily relating to the same cases) were accepted in respect of 230 family members and refused of 600. These figures include a small number of Laotions and Kampucheans.

Crossbows

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has recived seeking the introduction of regulations to control the ownership and use of crossbows; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Since January 1985 we have received 43 letters about crossbows from hon. Members, 31 from members of the public and one from the Association of District Councils. I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) on 3 February at column 5.

Data Protection

Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what steps have been taken to inform holders of data bases of the requirement to register under the Data Protection Act;

(2) what steps have been taken to public the procedure by which holders of data bases should register under the Data Protection Act.

Mr. Waddington: The Data Protection Registrar commissioned a national advertising campaign about the requirements of the Data Protection Act 1984 at the end of last year, and a further campaign is to be launched shortly aimed at reminding those affected by the Act that they must register their data holdings by 11 May. In addition, the Registrar and members of his staff have given many talks to business organisations and others about the Act's provisions. The Registrar has issued a number of booklets about the requirements of the Act which are available free of charge.

Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps have been taken to inform associations, clubs and societies of any circumstances under which they might be required to register data bases under the Data Protection Act.

Mr. Waddington: The publicity campaigns commissioned by the Data Protection Registrar have been aimed at all data users who might be affected by the Data Protection Act 1984, including associations, clubs and societies. The Registrar has also given guidance to representative bodies in the voluntary sector.

Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he proposes to issue any guidance to Members of Parliament relating to the implications of the Data Protection Act for the keeping of records on computers relating to their constituents.

Mr. Waddington: No; but the general advice issued by the Data Protection Registrar will, I think, be found helpful to Members, and I understand that an article on the subject, written after consultation with the Registrar, is to appear in The House Magazine.

Dogs (Model Byelaws)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will report on the progress of the pilot project to test the effectiveness of model byelaws designed to reduce the problem of dogs fouling in public places; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: On 2 September byelaws came into force in four local authority areas which make it an offence for a person in charge of a dog in parks, footpaths and other designated areas to fail to remove any faeces deposited by the dog. The local authorities are the London borough of Barking and Dagenham, Gosport borough council, North-West Leicestershire district council and Rochester upon Medway city council. Indications so far are that the level of compliance by dog owners in these areas has been high and in consequence parks and so on are noticeably very much cleaner. Towards the end of this year we shall assess the effectiveness of the scheme overall and whether the byelaws should be offered as models for adoption by other local authorities.

New Prisons

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans exist for building new prisons; when these establishments will receive their first prisoners; if he proposes to build any new prisons in west Yorkshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The new prison building programme consists of 16 projects, of which three have already been completed. The following table indicates when these establishments are expected to receive their first inmates.

Name of establishment	Location	Projected date for reception of first inmates
Wayland	Griston, Norfolk	Occupied
Stocken	Stretton, Leicestershire	Occupied
Thorn Cross	Appleton Thorn, Cheshire	Occupied
Full Sutton	Stamford Bridge, Humberside	April 1987
Littlehey	Perry, Cambridgeshire	September 1987
Mount	Bovingdon, Hertfordshire	October 1987
Swaleside	Eastchurch, Kent	April 1988
Garth	Ulnes Walton, Lancashire	June 1988
Brinsford	Wolverhampton, Staffordshire	December 1989
Whitemoor	March, Cambridgeshire	April 1990
Bicester	Arncott, Oxfordshire	October 1990
Woolwich	Woolwich, Greater London	July 1991
Lancaster Farms	Lancaster, Lancashire	October 1991
Milton Keynes	Milton Keynes, Buckinghamshire	March 1992
Doncaster	Doncaster, South Yorkshire	*1992
Ashford	Ashford, Middlesex	*1993

* Provisional.

Design work is planned to start on two further establishments in due course. The locations of these projects have not yet been finally determined. There are at present no plans to build new prisons in west Yorkshire, but major redevelopment is in progress or planned for the five existing establishments in the county.

Animal Experimentation

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to control experiments on invertebrates.

Mr. Mellor: We have no present plans to do so. However, the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Bill contains a power to extend control to work on invertebrate animals.

News International, Wapping

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many special patrol group units were present at the picket outside News International premises at Wapping on 15 February; and how many of the special patrol group officers present were equipped with firearms.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner that eight units of the special patrol group were deployed at Wapping on 15 February. None of the officers was equipped with a firearm.

Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to the cost to date of policing the industrial dispute at Wapping; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the additional costs incurred by the Metropolitan police in policing the News International dispute at Wapping are estimated at some £200,000.

Industrial Disputes (Policing)

Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to require the owners of businesses involved in industrial disputes whose premises require the attendance of the police there or nearby in connection with, or as a result of, the dispute to meet the full cost of the additional policing necessary; and if he will make a statment.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No.

Prisoners (Strip Searches)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what rules, instructions and guidelines are applicable to the strip-searching and intimate searching of male prisoners in Her Majesty's prisons; if he will place copies in the Library; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what rules, instructions and guidelines are applicable to the strip-searching and intimate searching of female prisoners in Her Majesty 's prisons; if he will place copies in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The following information relates to prison department establishments in England and Wales. Responsibility for establishments in Scotland and Northern Ireland rests with my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Northern Ireland.

The rules, instructions and guidelines relevant to these matters relate equally to male and female inmates.

General provisions on searching are contained in rule 39 of the Prison Rules 1964 and rule 43 of both the Youth Custody Centre Rules 1983 and Detention Centre Rules 1983, copies of which are available in the Library. These rules make it clear that prisoners (including remand prisoners) are to be searched on reception into a prison department establishment and subsequently as the governor thinks necessary. Standing instructions provide that the search on reception should be a strip search, and other times at which prisoners may be strip searched include before and after court appearances, before and after visits, at the time of cell changes and during wing and cell searches.

While an intimate search of a body orifice could be carried out under the provisions of the rules, no such search would be conducted without the consent of the inmate, or otherwise without special authorisation, which would be granted only in the most exceptional circumstances.

Detailed instructions on searching are contained in documents whose availability is restricted in the interests of security.

Merseyside Constabulary

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the figures for the authorised establishment of the Merseyside constabulary for each year since the force's foundation; what was the actual strength of the force in each of these years; and if he will express this data as a percentage of the country's population.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information is as follows:

Merseyside Police

On 31 December	Authorised establishment	Strength	Population of force area	Population per officer: Based on establishment	Population per officer: Based on strength
1974	4,317	3,852	1,602,700	371	416

* Including recruitment to posts authorised on a temporary supernumerary basis for special purposes, and 100 supernumerary constable posts authorised in 1979 in anticipation of the substantive increase in establishment approved in March 1981.

Voluntary Sector (Government Support)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, in order, the 10 largest beneficiaries of Government support to the voluntary sector in the years 1979 to 1985.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that because there is no central record of grant giving by Government Departments which distinguishes grants to particular organisations within grand totals, the information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

British Nationality (Fees) Regulations 1984

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to increase the fee levels set out in the British Nationality (Fees) Regulations 1984.

Mr. Hurd: Some increases in fees will be necessary in order to meet the forecast costs of dealing with citizenship applications from 1 April 1986. The revised fee levels are as set out:

	Present Fees £	New Fees £
Registration (adult or minor)	55	60
Naturalisation on grounds of marriage	55	60
All other naturalisations	160	170

These fee levels include an application fee, which is payable for all applications and which will remain at £10. Other fees payable to the Home Office, for renouncing citizenship and for copy certificates and other documents will also remain at £10. The fee for administering the oath of allegiance, which is payable to the person administering the oath, will be increased from £2 to £3 in order to bring it in line with fees for analogous work under the Commissioners for Oaths (Fees) Order 1984.

The existing arrangements for joint applicants will be unchanged: husbands and wives applying together for naturalisation will continue to pay the single fee, as will minor children of the same parent applying together for registration.

The fee levels have been set to provide sufficient income from the applications we expect to deal with next year to meet their forecast costs, after allowing for the cost of unsuccessful applications. These forecasts are summarised in the nationality fees budget income and expenditure account for the year ending 31 March 1987, a copy of which I have placed in the Library.

Regulations amending the British Nationality (Fees) Regulations 1984 are being laid before Parliament today with the intention that the new fee levels should come into operation on 1 April 1986. These will be the first changes in citizenship fees for two years.

South Yorkshire Police

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of South Yorkshire as to the number of people prosecuted in the last 12 months for which figures are available for the alleged illegal sale or renting of firearms.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 14 February 1986, c. 565]: The chief constable of South Yorkshire informs me that there is an outstanding case in which one person has been charged with offences under section 3(1) of the Firearms Act 1968 and a second person has been charged with offences under section 3(2) of the Act. There have been no other prosecutions under section 3(1) or (2) in the last 12 months.

SCOTLAND

Highlands and Islands Development Board

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland in view of the current level of demand for development assistance, if he will make an immediate allocation to the Highlands and Islands Development Board of £1 million in the current financial year.

Mr. John MacKay: No. The board has reallocated its resources to meet the demand.

Holyrood Park (Orange Order Rally)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the Orange Order requesting the use of Edinburgh's Holyrood park for a demonstration and rally on 28 June 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: In a letter dated 11 April 1985 the Loyal Orange Institution of Scotland sought permission to hold a demonstration in Holyrood park to commemorate the 296th anniversary of the battle of the Boyne. In line with the current policy for the use by organisation of the royal park for such purposes, the application was refused. I have received no further representations on the matter.

North of Scotland Hydro-Electric Board (Report)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what response has been made by the North of Scotland Hydro-Electric Board to the report on the board by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission which was published last autumn; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: I have received the initial response of the North of Scotland Hydro-Electric Board to the report of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission published on 3 October 1985. It gives the board's comments on the commission's findings and describes the action it is taking to meet the recommendations. Copies of the board's response have been placed in the Library of the House.

I welcome the commission's findings that the board is not pursuing any course of conduct against the public interest and that the board does its job well, striking an appropriate balance between its requirements to supply electricity efficiently and economically and its environmental and social obligations. The commission found that the board's investment appraisal procedures are basically sound, that its financial and management accounting and information systems are sound and well run and that the management and operation of the board's generating function are of a high standard.

Nevertheless, the commission noted a number of areas where improvements in the board's performance should be made. These included cost and stock control and the way in which control is exercised within a delegated management structure. The board has undertaken to improve its efforts to control and reduce costs and has accepted many of the recommendations on delegation. In some cases the board is re-examining existing procedures in the light of the commission's findings.

I particularly welcome the board's positive and constructive approach to the priority issues identified by the commission. The board has confirmed its commitment to the refurbishment of the distribution system and to the development of an assessment system for allocating resources within the refurbishment programme. It has indicated that the management services function is to be strengthened; that a system of cost reduction targets to be set and monitored by the board is being instituted; that the development and introduction of management information systems designed to improve monitoring will continue; and that standard guidelines for investment appraisal and project management procedures will be drawn up.

My Department will maintain contact with the board in its task of implementing the commission's recommendations, and I have asked the board to report to me its progress and achievements by October 1986.

Western Isles

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Government will press for an extension of the integrated development programme for the Western Isles.

Mr. Rifkind: The European Commission has informed us that it does not intend to propose a full extension of the integrated development programme (IDP) beyond May 1987. The Government agree that, in the light of progress already made, there is no need for a full-scale extension of the IDP. But we have asked the Commission to give some attention now to how some of the loose ends can best be tied up so that the IDP's significant achievements can be consolidated.

TRANSPORT

Untaxed Motor Vehicles

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the number of people prosecuted for driving untaxed motor vehicles in each of the last three years.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) on 10 December 1985. The number of prosecutions so far in 1985-86 is 149,000 and the number of out-of-court settlements is 109,000.

Driving Tests

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people applied each year since 1980 for Ministry of Transport driving instruction tests; and if he will list the pass/fail rate.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The qualifying examination for the Department of Transport's register of approved driving instructors is made up of both written and practical parts. In May 1985 the practical test was split into two constituent parts of driving ability and instruction ability, taken separately.

The following figures represent attempts made; records do not distinguish between first and subsequent attempts by the same person.

Written

Year	Attempts	Pass rate per cent.
1980	4,821	71·3
1981	5,265	75·0
1982	5,894	47·5
1983	6,285	49·9
1984	8,308	52·1
1985	8,313	61·1

Practical

Year	Attempts	Pass rate per cent.
1980	4,697	48·6
1981	5,419	45·7

Year	Attempts	Pass rate per cent.
1982	4,981	44·6
1983	4,766	43·2
1984	6,221	41·1
1985	*10,798	47·2

*. Two-part examination from May 1985.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Transport if there are any plans to revise the Ministry of Transport driving instruction test; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department of Transport's qualifying examination for the register of approved driving instructors is kept under continuous review. The written part was completely revised in 1982 with the introduction of a multiple choice answer format. Four new papers in this format are being introduced in April this year to replace the original four introduced at that time.

The expected standard of the applicant's own driving ability was raised in 1984 and a higher standard for the instructional ability test was introduced in May 1985.

No further modifications are planned.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has plans to bring greater and more effective liaison between driving examiners and instructors.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Local liaison between examiners and instructors is necessarily limited to ensure impartiality of testing. The Department organises regular opportunities for instructors to visit the Department's driving establishment at Cardington, Bedfordshire, to see how examiners are trained. Senior officials meet instructors' representatives frequently.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of people working at each driving centre in Hampshire each year since 1980.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The number of staff at centres in Hampshire at various dates between 1 January 1981 and 5 March 1986 are as shown. No figures are available for 1980.

	1 January 1981	8 November 1982	1 June 1983	1 April 1984	1 April 1985	5 March 1986
Aldershot	5	5	5	3	4	5
Basingstoke	*	2	2	1	3	4
Farnborough	5	5	4	4	4	6
Gosport	5	5	5	5	5	5
Portsmouth	6	7	7	7	6	7
Southampton (FHD)	4	6	6	5	5	5
Southampton (Maybush)	7	6	6	6	5	7
Winchester	5	3	3	3	4	4

* Opened 1 August 1981.

The number of people working at each centre alters and there will have been fluctuations both up and down in the periods between the figures quoted.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received asking for a change in the way driving licences are issued.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I am afraid this information is not readily available. But there is little evidence of recent complaint about centralised issue of driving licences.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Transport how the Ministry of Transport driving instruction test compares to regulations in other European Economic Community countries.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is not possible to draw simple comparisons between arrangements for driving instruction in the various member states of the EEC because systems and conditions differ widely and are related closely to local licensing and testing practices. I am satisfied that the present examination for entry to the register of approved driving instructors is adequate.

Manchester International Airport

Mr. Couchman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total value of European Economic Community grants and subsidies given to Manchester international airport since 1956.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Manchester international airport has been allocated grants totalling £10·6 million by the European regional development fund for airport development.

Mr. Couchman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total value of Government subsidy given to Manchester international airport since it was formed in 1956.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I shall answer this question shortly.

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Transport, if he will make a statement on the future ownership and control of Manchester international airport following the abolition of the Greater Manchester council on 1 April.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The 10 districts within the present Greater Manchester council (GMC) have reached agreement on the establishment of a joint committee to assume control of the operation of Manchester international airport (MIA) on 1 April. They have also agreed on the transfer to them from the same date of the GMC's interests in the airport. It is the districts' intention shortly thereafter to transfer MIA to a jointly-owned public limited company.

As I indicated in my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East, (Mr. Thurnham) on 6 December 1985, the Government continue to have reservations about some of the details of the arrangements for the new company; but the districts have acknowledged that these arrangements will have to be brought into compliance with the requirements of the Airports Bill once it is enacted. We shall be ready to use our powers under the Bill to ensure that that is brought about.

Accordingly, I have today laid before the House the Local Government Reorganisation (Airports) Order, made under section 40(1) of the Local Government Act 1985, which, inter alia, will transfer the interests of the GMC in MIA to the districts in accordance with the agreement they have reached.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the future ownership and control of Manchester airport.

Mr. Ridley: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the reply my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery) earlier today.

Plastic Firearms

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration has been given to reports of the manufacture of lethal plastic firearms undetectable by X-ray inspection at airports, and so on; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave to the right hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Freeson) on 6 March 1986.

DEFENCE

Fleet

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the reasons why each of the Royal Naval ships listed in the answer of 5 February, Official Report, columns 183-4, to the hon. Member for Northampton North, are to be withdrawn.

Mr. Stanley: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Chemical Weapons

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations will take place between the Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe and Her Majesty's Government before deciding on a North Atlantic Treaty Organisation force goal on chemical weapons.

Mr. Stanley: A force goal requiring the United States to modernise its chemical weapons stocks with binary munitions is being discussed collectively within NATO in accordance with normal Alliance procedures.

Trident Base

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement about his plans to locate the Trident nuclear base in Scotland.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to (a) the statement made by the then Secretary of State for Defence on 15 July 1980, at columns 1235-1236; (b) the statement made by the then Secretary of State for Defence on the processing of Trident missiles on 9 September 1982 in Ministry of Defence news release 42/82, a copy of which is in the Library; (c) the notice of proposed development at the Clyde submarine base (Faslane and Coulport) and the associated environmental impact statement submitted in May 1984, copies of which are in the Library.

Helicopters

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many troop carrying helicopters with medium lift capacity are available to the British Army of the Rhine.

Mr. Stanley: In peacetime a squadron of Chinook aircraft is available in support of BAOR for its medium lift requirement; in a period of tension or war this squadron would be reinforced. It is not the practice to disclose numbers of operational aircraft.

Helicopter Pilots

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the comparative costs of training a helicopter pilot in (a) the Army, (b) the Royal Navy and (c) the Royal Air Force; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The cost of training a helicopter pilot in the Royal Navy is approximately £500,000. The figures for the Army and the Royal Air Force are given in my reply today to my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames), but I would draw the attention of my hon. Friend to the caveats in that answer.

Air Staff Target 404

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make an announcement on Air Staff target 404 and to complete the review of the role of helicopters in the armed forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I have nothing to add to what my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement said on this subject in the debate on the Royal Air Force on 26 February, at columns 1033-35.

Royal Marines

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, further to the answer of 27 February, Official Report, column 667, relating to minimum height requirements, he will now also give the relevant figures in imperial units.

Mr. Lee: The equivalent imperial units (in inches) are obtained by dividing the figures given in my earlier answer by 2·54.

Nuclear-related Research and Development

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many people in his Department are employed in military nuclear-related research and development.

Mr. Norman Lamont: It would not be in the public interest to reveal numbers of staff employed in defence nuclear-related research and development.

Helicopter Pilots

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the cost of training an Army helicopter pilot;

(2) what is the cost of training a Royal Air Force helicopter pilot.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 3 March 1986 c. 71]: Helicopter pilots are trained in each of the three services for different operational requirements, and therefore straightforward financial comparisons could be misleading.

Further, all RAF pilots are initially trained with a view to fast jet service and only join the helicopter or multi-engine stream at a later stage.

However, the costs of training a helicopter pilot in the RAF and Army are estimated to be £940,000 and £200,000, respectively.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

1-3 The Sanctuary, London

Mr. Frank Field asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, if, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Birkenhead, 3 March, Official Report, column 3, he will detail the years during which the Church Commissioners spent the £163,000 on 1-3 The Sanctuary, London SW1.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The details are as follows:

Year	£
1975	18,160·48
1976	17,732·33
1977	7,128·00
1981	87,157·69
1985	33,227·53
Total	163,406·03

EMPLOYMENT

Leicester (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Spencer asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on his recent visit to Leicester.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I visited Leicester on 28 February following our recently announced initiative to help the Highfields inner city area, and seven other similar areas, by setting up a task force to co-ordinate Government spending, improve the allocation of resources, and forge links with the local community. In the course of the day I met political leaders and officials of Leicestershire county and Leicester city councils, and had a valuable working lunch with representatives and residents of Leicester's Highfields workshop centre.

I also had the opportunity of briefly visiting a garage set up under the enterprise allowance scheme in the Highfields area.

North Sea Offshore Construction (Pay)

Mr. Eadie asked the Paymaster General if he will tabulate the information available on the movement of hourly rates of pay for all trades in North sea offshore construction in January 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985 and 1986, respectively.

Mr. Trippier: The available information on earnings in the construction industry does not enable those engaged in North sea offshore construction to be separately identified.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Horses (Docked Tails)

Mr. Greenway asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will institute proceedings under the Docking and Nicking of Horses Act 1949 against the owners of the nine Clydesdale horses from Scotland shown at the 1985 Royal Show with docked tails; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I understand that no horses with docked tails were entered for the 1985 Royal Show. On 22 August 1985, in Kilmarnock sheriff court, two persons were convicted of contraventions of the Docking and Nicking of Horses Act 1949 in respect of the docking of nine Clydesdale horses, but this case had no connection either with the Royal Show or the Royal Highland Show.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Dental Charges

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, further to the answer on dental treatment costs of 22 October 1985, Official Report, columns 283-4, the information requested is now available.

Mr. Hayhoe: Patients who pay charges will have borne on average approximately 60 per cent. of the cost of chargeable items included in courses of treatment completed in the year ending 31 March 1986.

Pensioner Households

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish estimates of the number of pensioner households who do not take up housing benefit to which they are entitled.

Mr. Major: We expect to be able to publish estimates of take-up of housing benefit, based on the 1984 family expenditure survey, within the next two months.

Retirement Age

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what factors his Department bases its conclusion that any change in respect of a flexible age of retirement would need to be phased in over 10 years.

Mr. Major: The Department has no firm views on the length of time that would be needed, but certainly it would have to be sufficient to enable individuals affected to adjust their plans, and to enable occupational pensions schemes to make any necessary consequential adjustment. A period would also be needed to allow state earnings-related pensions to build up to ensure those retiring below the normal pension age had adequate pension provision.

Medical Technology

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what new medical technology he proposes to introduce into the National Health Service during the next three years and at what cost; and what estimate he has made of the demands which are likely to be made on services within the National Health Service during the same period while introducing new medical technology.

Mr. Hayhoe: Funds are not allocated centrally to specific services except for designated supra-regional services. It is for health authorities to decide how best to develop their services, including the introduction of new medical technology, so as to meet the likely demand arising from demographic and other changes and the need to improve services in line with ministerial priorities, taking into account the overall resources expected to be available, including those generated through cost improvements. Data are not available centrally to work out separately the costs of and demand on services which arise from specific developments.

NHS Hospitals (Private Purchases)

Mr. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many National Health Service hospitals have purchased geriatric care services or provisions from private sector medical care establishments in each of the last seven years; and what costs have been incurred by the National Health Service each year as a result.

Mr. Hayhoe: Contractual arrangements to provide services to NHS patients in private establishments are made between the establishment concerned and the contributing health authority, not with individual NHS hospitals. No information is held centrally about the costs of contractual arrangements by specialty.

Information on the number of authorities with contractual arrangements for geriatric care are given in the table.

* District health authorities from 1982. Area health authorities prior to 1982.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many private patients had appointments with consultants in National Health Service hospitals in the West Midlands region in each of the last seven years; what sums were paid to each authority in the region for the use of rooms for such consultations; and what was the length of the waiting lists for different categories of treatments in each authority each year during the same period.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member all the information she seeks. Some of it is not collected centrally. The hon. Member may wish to write to the chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority about information on sums paid to each authority in the region for the use of rooms for private consultations. I shall let the hon. Member have a reply to the rest of her question as soon as possible.

Hip Replacement Operations

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many hip replacement operations have taken place in health authorities in the west midlands region in each of the last seven years; and what was the range of length of hospital stay for such operations.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have such information as can be obtained without incurring disproportionate cost as soon as possible.

NHS (Private Patients)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what revenue has been yielded to the National Health Service from treatment of private paying patients from European countries and middle east countries in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Hayhoe: No figures are kept to distinguish the country of origin of private patients.

West Midlands Regional Health Authority

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what cash limits have been imposed by his Department on the West Midlands regional health authority in each of the last seven years.

Mr. Hayhoe: The cash limits against which West Midlands regional health authority's outturn expenditure has been measured in each of the last seven years are shown in the table.

1978-79	431,705	30,206

Note:

NHS (Catering Services)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of the catering services within the National Health Service has been contracted out to the private sector each year since 1982.

Mr. Whitney: Following is the information requested, derived from the annual accounts of regional and district health authorities in England together with those of the special health authorities for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals.

Percentage of current expenditure on catering services paid to private contractors

	Percentage
1982-83	0·2
1983-84	0·2
1984-85	0·3

Note:
The figures are not strictly comparable over the whole period as value added tax on contracted out services became reclaimable by health authorities on 1 September 1983.

Draught-Proofing (Single Payments)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claims for single payments in respect of draught-proofing are currently outstanding at his Department's Woolwich supplementary benefit office; and what action is being taken to reduce the backlog.

Mr. Major: About 1,300 such claims are currently awaiting attention. Regional reserve staff are being assigned to Woolwich local office to assist with this work.

Benefit (Advice and Information)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to be able to make a statement on the outcome of the discussions between officials of his Department and interested groups relating to arrangements for the provision of localised information regarding the availability of advice and information about social security benefits.

Mr. Major: Officials are considering comments received from interested groups and are examining the feasibility of procedural options. I shall write to the hon. and learned Member in due course.

Single Payments (Huyton)

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people are presently awaiting single payments in the Huyton office of his Department; and how many have been waiting for more than four weeks, eight weeks and 12 weeks, respectively.

Mr. Major: A recent count of claims for single payments in Huyton local office shows that 2,127 claims from 911 people were outstanding. Of these claims 775 had been in action for over four weeks and 229 had been in action for over eight weeks. There were no cases in action for over 12 weeks. In order to process single payment claims, it is often necessary to request additional information from claimants; this can add significantly to the time taken to determine them.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average length of time for which people presently have to wait for single payments in the Huyton office of his Department; and if he will break this figure down for claims relating to items of furniture, heating allowance and diet allowance, respectively.

Mr. Major: Information is not available to show the average length of time taken to process single payment claims.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claims for single payments have been made in each quarterly period for the last three full years for which figures are available at the Huyton office of his Department.

Mr. Major: This information is not available in precisely the form requested; statistics are collected on a four-weekly rather than a quarterly basis. And, prior to 11 April 1984, the number of unsuccessful claims was not recorded, only the number of payments made.

The following table covers the calendar years 1983, 1984 and 1985:

Huyton

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide a breakdown for people awaiting single payments at the Huyton office of his Department, between the numbers claiming for items of furniture, diet allowance and extra heating allowance, respectively.

Mr. Major: Information is not available in the precise form requested. A recent count has shown that 970 single payment claims for furniture are outstanding at the Huyton local office, but, as one person can make several claims at any one time, information cannot be derived from this to show how many people are awaiting such single payments.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the average period of delay experienced by claimants to the Huyton office of his Department for the hearing of tribunal appeal cases;

(2) how many people are presently awaiting the hearing of tribunal appeal cases at the Huyton office of his Department; and how many have experienced delays of three, four, five and six months, respectively.

Mr. Major: There are currently 123 social security benefit appeals outstanding at the Department's Huyton local office. The latest available statistics, which are for the quarter ended 31 December 1984, show that the average length of time from lodgement of a social security benefit appeal to tribunal hearing, for the social security north-western region which covers the Huyton area, was 15·8 weeks. A breakdown of this figure is given in the table.

Equivalent figures are not available for localities smaller than a region.

Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many responses he has had to his Department's consultation paper on the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill from organisations of and for disabled people; if he will list the organisations concerned; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Copper 7 Contraceptive Device

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether his Department will review the safety of the Copper 7 contraceptive device.

Mr. Whitney: The Department has seen no evidence to suggest that women should stop using this device. There are therefore no plans to review its safety at this time.

Benefit Statistics

Sir Frederic Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the latest figures for the number of men aged 60 to 64 years, inclusive, who are currently unemployed and in receipt of unemployment benefit; and what is his estimate of the total cost to the Government.

Mr. Major: At May 1985 there were 46,900 men aged 60 to 64 years in receipt of unemployment benefit. The estimated annual cost of this benefit for this group is £79·9 million at that date.

Departmental Staffing Levels

Mr. Lewis Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about staffing levels in his Department.

Mr. Fowler: A full review of the local office complement is currently in progress, and its results will be known about the end of the year. I am also arranging for an urgent review of social security tasks to be carried out to identify any further scope for reducing work load. The results of these two reviews will be taken into account in deciding the manpower requirements of the social security organisation after April 1987.

Meanwhile, to relieve present pressures and permit the new work which will be required in 1986-87 to prepare for two upratings, in July 1986 and April 1987, the manpower target for my Department as a whole at 1 April 1986 will be increased by 2,300, to 93,400; some 2,000 extra staff already in post in the local offices are being retained and a further 3,350 posts will be added during the following financial year to produce a new manpower target of 96,750 for 1 April 1987. For local offices, taking the two years together, the new targets will allow for an increase above complement of over 5,000 new staff. The provision includes an additional 500 staff for the extra effort against fraud which I undertook to initiate in the debate on the Address on 11 November last at columns 323-24. I should like to pay tribute to the efforts made by the staff and management of our offices, particularly those in inner cities, to maintain services to the public.

Psychiatric Service

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many local authorities social services departments provide a 24-hour emergency psychiatric service; and if he will list those which do not.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 17 February 1986, c. 70]: I understand that at present Bexley, Gateshead, Barnsley and Kent do not have such a service. The last two authorities are known to be in the process of introducing one.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of domestic ratepayers in Portsmouth receive housing benefit.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 28 February 1986, c. 715]: We estimate that the number of rate rebate recipients, based on the local authority's subsidy returns, as a proportion of the number of domestic ratepayers in Portsmouth is about 38 per cent.

WALES

Teachers

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many students qualified to be teachers left the University of Wales and the teacher training colleges of Wales at the end of each academic year since 1975; and (a) how many were qualified in each of the main subjects and (b) how many were qualified to teach their subject through the medium of Welsh.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The available information about the number of students qualifying in each year is given in the following tables. Information about the number able to teach through the medium of Welsh is not collected centrally.

A483 (Traffic Statistics)

Mr. Harvey asked the Secretary of State for Wales what the level of traffic on the A483 between Chirk and Ruabon was when last counted in April 1983; and what are the comparable figures for traffic volumes on other principal two-lane roads in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The average weekday traffic flow on the A483 between Chirk and Ruabon in April 1983 was 13,100 vehicles for the 12-hour period between 0700 and 1900 hours.

Twelve-hour average weekday flows on other two-lane trunk roads in Wales with similar urban characteristics were:

A483 between Rossett and the English border, 11,500 vehicles in September 1981.

A494 between Mold and Ewloe, 8,200 vehicles in September 1983.

A4042 at Llantarnam (Gwent), 14,500 vehicles in September 1983.

Primary Schools (Anglesey)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of children on Anglesey in primary education speak Welsh as their principal language.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Assessments of fluency made by head teachers of primary schools in Anglesey in September 1984 indicate that Welsh was the home language of 35·3 per cent. of all pupils. A further 25·1 per cent. whose home language was not Welsh could speak Welsh fluently.

Assisted Places

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much has been spent on the assisted places scheme in each local authority area in Wales since the introduction of the scheme.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Details of expenditure under the assisted places scheme in each local authority area in Wales for the financial years 1981-82 to 1984-85 inclusive are given below:

Local Authority Area	Expenditure
Clwyd	536,250
Dyfed	63,584
Gwent	120,993
Powys	113,783
South Glamorgan	326,609

There are no assisted place schools in Gwynedd, Mid and West Glamorgan.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much was spent on the assisted places scheme in Wales in each year since the scheme was introduced.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Expenditure on the assisted places scheme in Wales in the financial years 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 was £101,742, £274,777, £455,156 and £626,876 respectively.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Family Planning Aid

Mr. Dorrell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the expenditure from the overseas aid budget on population and family planning-related research projects from the health and population division's population research and development Vote for each of the years 1983, 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Raison: Expenditure amounted to £155,000 in 1983 and £270,000 in 1984. The final figure for 1985 is not yet available.

Mr. Dorrell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what research projects related to population and family planning are currently being supported by the Overseas Development Administration.

Mr. Raison: A study on contraception usage in rural areas of Egypt; a study on attitudes towards child health and relationships to mortality in India; programme to test and develop materials on contraceptive methods for African countries; preparation of instructional materials for non-literate users of contraceptive foam in Pakistan; an analysis of the relationships between demographic variables and socio-economic development in Kenya.

Mr. Dorrell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for funding for family planning and population research projects have been received since March 1984 and from whom; which of these were accepted; how much funding was committed irrespective of the year of disbursement; which were rejected; and for what reason.

Mr. Raison: Nine applications for funding for family planning and population research projects have been received since March 1984. Three have been accepted: from the Program for the Introduction and Adaptation of Contraceptive Technology (PIACT)—£19,000; from the Centre for Population Studies at the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine—£22,800; and from Cardiff University College Population Centre—£6,000. Five proposals are currently under consideration. They have been submitted by the Cardiff University College Population Centre; the University of Edinburgh; the International Planned Parenthood Federation; the Program for the Introduction and Adaptation of Contraceptive Technology; and the Population and Community Development Association of Thailand. One proposal, from an individual researcher, was rejected on technical grounds.

British Council

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why the administration of the British Council's book presentation for Namibia has been moved from Lusaka, Zambia to Pretoria, South Africa.

Mr. Raison: There has been no change in the arrangements for administering this scheme. It forms part of a small technical co-operation programme for Namibians within that territory which for some time has been administered by the British Council in Pretoria. A similar programme for Namibian refugees in Zambia continues to be managed by the council in Lusaka.

Food Surpluses

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent consideration he has given to the disposal of food surpluses presently stored in the United Kingdom towards world famine relief.

Mr. Raison: The purpose of food aid is not to dispose of food surpluses but to help relieve famine and promote long-term development. The substantial food aid programmes of the European Community (up to 1·54 million tonnes of cereals and large quantities of other products in 1986) and of the British Government (110,000 tonnes of cereals annually) have the effect of reducing surplus stocks here to the extent that they are bought in the United Kingdom.

Tanzania

Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on future aid to Tanzania.

Mr. Raison: Our capital aid programme to Tanzania includes assistance towards the maintenance of the Songea-Makambako road, the southern regions health project and rural development projects in Lindi-Mtwara and other areas. Technical co-operation for Tanzanian universities, for English language training and for the Tanzania harbour authority is also being maintained.

I have indicated that we are also ready to provide balance of payments support for the Tanzania Government once an economic programme is in place along lines advocated by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

Sudan and Somalia (Students)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the number of grants being given by his Department towards the education costs of studying in the United Kingdom to students from the Sudan and Somalia.

Mr. Raison: By 31 December 1985, 271 students from the Sudan and 57 from Somalia had been awarded grants during the financial year 1985-86 to study in Britain.

Population and Family Planning Projects

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the estimated cost and duration of bilateral population and family planning projects currently being supported by the Overseas Development Administration.

Mr. Raison: We are currently supporting the following bilateral population and family planning projects:

Botswana
Support to the Ministry of Health for provision of a technical co-operation officer for public health and family planning; £120,000; 1983-86.

Fiji
Support to the Central Statistics Office; £50,000; 1986-87.

India
Assistance to the Orissa family welfare project; £1·9 million; 1985-86.
Assistance to the Hyderabad slum improvement project; £70,000; 1985-87.
Assistance to an integrated family welfare project, Gujarat; £1·9 million; 1984-87.
Assistance to the Registrar General's office; £30,000 1984-87.

Kenya
Assistance to an integrated rural health and family planning project; approximately £900,000; 1983-87.

Malaysia
Support for a population training course at the Asian and Pacific Development Centre in Kuala Lumpur; £12,000; 1986.

Nepal
Asistance to community based family planning/maternal and child health activities; approximately £60,000; 1984-85.

Pakistan
Assistance to the implementation of the population welfare plan; £4·8 million; 1983-87.

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which countries received assistance for national family planning and population projects under the Overseas Development Administration bilateral aid programme in 1984.

Mr. Raison: British assistance for population-related activities was provided to the following countries in 1984:

Anguilla
Bangladesh
Botswana
China
Egypt
India
Kenya
Kiribati
Mauritius
Nepal
Pakistan
Vanuatu
Yemen Arab Republic
Zaire
Zimbabwe

In addition, we provided support for regional activies in Asia and the Caribbean.

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a list of proposals for bilateral aid assistance to population-related activities which he is at present considering, setting out the countries involved and the estimated cost to the United Kingdom of the proposals.

Mr. Raison: The following proposals for bilateral assistance to population-related projects and programmes are under consideration:

Bangladesh
Assistance to a population and family health project; £8 million over five years.

India
Further assistance to the Orissa family welfare project; estimated cost up to £15 million over five years.

Pakistan
Assistance to establish reproductive health service centres; £1·8 million over five years.

Zimbabwe
Assistance to a family health project; approximately £1 million over five years.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Draize Tests

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the number of Draize tests carried out in the United Kingdom in the latest available year.

Mr. Mellor: The specific information requested is not available because Draize eye tests are not separately identified in the current returns on statistics of experiments performed on living animals. However, statistics are available on the number of experiments involving the application of substances to the eyes of rabbits, which are mainly Draize tests: in 1984, 7,751 such experiments were started in Great Britain.

The majority of these Draize tests are probably modified Draize tests; such modifications are designed to restrict the damage the test may inflict on the experimental animal—for example, using a small volume or a dilute solution of the substance to be tested, or washing out the eye shortly after the application of the substance. The Government are taking urgent steps to encourage the development of alternatives to the Draize test and to ensure that tests carried out in this country use as few animals and cause as little harm as possible.

The concern surrounding the use of Draize tests is well recognised. It is intended that, when the statistical return is revised to take account of the proposed legislation, this revised return should identify such tests separately.

Passport Office (Computerisation)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the operational requirements issued to the potential suppliers of the proposed computer system for the computerisation of passport details by the Passport Office; what details on passport holders will be stored in the system; and if passport photographs will be held in it.

Mr. Waddington: The operational requirement for the computerised passport issuing system is a formal, technical document. It was intended for the computer trade, and was freely available, having been advertised in accordance with GATT rules in the Supplement to the Official Journal of the European Communities No. S 216/29 dated 9 November 1985. I am sending a copy to the hon. Member.

The proposed computer system will hold only the following details of passport applicants: surname; forenames; title; sex; address; date, town and country of birth; passport number and type; previous passport number; credit card account number (for those paying by credit card); nationality and immigration status; names and dates of birth of any children included in the passport.

The operational requirement does not call for photographs of applicants to be held in the system.

Fire Service (Disciplinary Proceedings)

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the number of cases in the last five years of which he is aware in which disciplinary proceedings against an officer of the fire service led, wholly or partially, to the deprivation of pension rights.

Mr. Hurd: The power to withdraw pension is not available in disciplinary proceedings but arises under the Firemen's Pension Scheme Order 1973 on conviction of certain criminal offences. I know of no cases in the past five years in which the power has been exercised.

Police Officers (Submachine Guns)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his authority has been sought for the overt carriage of submachine guns by police officers (a) at Manchester international airport and (b) at any other airport other than Heathrow; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. The decision in relation to Manchester international airport is one for the chief constable of Greater Manchester.

Sunday Trading

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what consideration he has given to the feasibility of limiting Sunday trading to a specified number of prescribed hours; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what consideration he has given to the feasibility of retaining some limits on the possible growth of Sunday trading by setting a modest maximum number of employees who may work in a shop or stores; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what consideration he has given to making the subject of deregulation of Sunday trading a matter for the decision of district councils; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he has given any consideration to restricting deregulation of Sunday trading to sales of foods, drinks and medicines; and if he will make a statement.

(5) what consideration he has given to representations from members of the National Chamber of Trade regarding the possible effects of deregulation of Sunday trading on small shops; and if he will make a statement;

(6) if he has given any consideration to experience in countries where Sunday trading is limited to prescribed hours; and if he will make a statement;

(7) if he has given any consideration to limiting Sunday trading to shops or stores of a prescribed modest maximum floor space or area; and if he will make a statement;

(8) what consideration he has given to the implications for the demand for public transport services of the deregulation of Sunday trading;

(9) if he has given any consideration to experience in countries where Sunday trading is limited by reference to prescribed maximum floor space or area of premises;

(10) what is his estimate of the effect of deregulation of Sunday trading on road traffic in urbanised, densely populated areas of the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The Government have given the closest consideration to the views expressed both by the Auld committee and in another place on all the possible options for amending the Shops Act 1950. They have also taken into account the experience of other countries and the views of the Auld committee and others on the likely implications of changes in the law for small shops as well as wider social considerations including public transport and urban traffic. The Government's view—like that of the Auld committee—remains that there is no remedy for the present deeply unsatisfactory situation as convincing as the proposals for total deregulation of shop hours contained in the Shops Bill.

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received from persons or organisations in Wales in favour of deregulation of Sunday trading, and how many in opposition; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that a separate record is not kept of representations from Wales and the information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mohsen Nikbakht

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the exact status of Mohsen Nikbakht; on what grounds he was admitted to the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: Mr. Mohsen Nikbakht is an Iranian, born in 1959, who first entered this country in 1984 to attend a full-time course of study at the North Trafford college in Manchester. He was readmitted to the United Kingdom on 26 January of this year to continue his studies for which he has leave until 31 October 1986.

Elham Nikbakht

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what grounds Elham Nikbakht was admitted to the United Kingdom; and what is her exact status.

Mr. Waddington: I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a similar question from my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) on 6 March at column 237.

Female Spouses

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many female spouses aged under 16 years are living in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a similar question from my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) on 6 March at column 237.

Safety Standards (Infringement)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many private actions were brought against farmers, landowners or employers of agricultural labour for infringement of safety standards or negligence following serious injuries in 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively; and what was the percentage of convictions in each year.

Mr. Mellor: Records available to me which may be incomplete are shown in the table.

The information collected centrally does not distinguish private prosecutions.

It is not possible to say how many proceedings followed a serious accident.

Court proceedings under the Agriculture (Safety, Health and Welfare Provisions) Act 1956 as amended by the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1975.

Immigration Control

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, further to the reply to the hon. Member for Battersea, 3 March Official Report, column 51, if he will immediately place in the Library his response to the Commission for Racial Equality's report on immigration control procedures.

Mr. Waddington: Copies were placed in the Library on 6 March.

Featherstone Prison

Mr. Rogker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of (a) escapes, (b) attempted escapes, (c) assaults on staff, (d) disciplinary offences and (e) the use of rule 43 have occurred at Her Majesty's prison Featherstone during the last 12 months; and to what extent he attributes the incidence of such cases to overcrowding.

Mr. Mellor: The following figures relate to 1985:

(a) five, involving a total of seven prisoners;
(b) one;
(c) none;
(d) 320 prisoners for a total of 480 offences (these figures are provisional);
(e) 29 prisoners on a total of 30 occasions.

The certified normal accomodation for Featherstone is 510 and the average population during 1985 was 546; this does not represent excessive overcrowding.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Dyslexia

Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy on the detection and teaching of dyslexic children; what resources are devoted to the training of teachers in detecting and teaching dyslexic children; what priority he attaches to the early detection of dyslexia in children; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The Education Act 1981 concentrates on identifying each child's individual needs and on ensuring these needs are met. It deliberately seeks to avoid categorising children. Local education authorities and school governors have the responsibility for the detection and teaching of children with special educational needs, including those with special reading difficulties. Local education authorities should provide guidance to all maintained schools in their area of the arrangements for identifying, assessing and meeting special educational needs. It is important that any child with special educational needs should be identified as early as possible.

The criteria governing all courses of initial teacher training require that students should be introduced to ways of identifying children with special educational needs, helped to appreciate what the ordinary school can and cannot do for such children and given some knowledge of the specialist help available and how it can be enlisted. The Government have provided specific grants of about £2 million annually since 1983-84 to provide in-service teacher training to help teachers in mainstream schools to cope with many kinds of special needs.

Grammar Schools

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give the total number of grammar schools in the United Kingdom; and what percentage this represents of all secondary schools in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dunn: In January 1985 there were 194 grammar schools in the United Kingdom, accounting for nearly 4 per cent. of all public sector secondary schools.

Higher Education

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will set out in tabular form the numbers obtaining minimum university entrance qualifications and entering university in each year from 1963 to the latest available date and differentiated as follows (a) those obtaining university entrance qualifications as a percentage of the relevant age group, (b) university entrants as a percentage of the relevant age group and (c) university entrants as a percentage of those with university entrance qualifications;

(2) if he will set out in tabular form the numbers obtaining minimum entrance qualifications to public sector higher education institutions and entering such institutions in each year from 1963 to the latest available date and differentiated as follows (a) those obtaining entrance qualifications as a percentage of the relevant age group, (b) actual entrants as a percentage of the relevant age group and (c) actual entrants as a percentage of those with entrance qualifications.

Mr. Walden: The available information is given in the table using the Department's normal definition of participation indices for higher education. Information prior to 1970 is not readily available on the same basis.

* Qualified leavers are those leaving school or further education colleges with at least 2 GCE A levels, or 3 Scottish Higher Certificates.

† The Qualified Leavers Index (QLI) consists of the proportion of the age group who obtained 2 or more A levels, or their Scottish equivalent.

‡ Aged under 21 in the year of entry.

‖ The Age Participation Index (API) is defined as the number of young home initial entrants expressed as a percentage of the "relevant age group", being the average of the number of 18 years olds and number of 19 year olds in the population as at 31 December of the year of entry. This measure has replaced the previously used age participation rate (APR) based solely upon 18 year olds.

¶ The Qualified Participation Index (QPI) is defined as the number of young home initial entrants whether qualified or not expressed as a percentage of the numbers of qualified school and FE leavers (this measure was known formerly as the qualified participation rate).

Research Councils

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of public money allocated to each of the research councils is spent in Wales.

Mr. Walden: The table shows the information requested.

ESRC	1·4
MRC	1·7

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much has been spent on the assisted places scheme in England in each year since the commencement of the scheme.

Mr. Dunn: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) on 20 January at column 80.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much has been spent on the assisted places scheme in each local education authority in England in each year since the scheme was introduced.

Mr. Dunn: As regards 1983-84, I refer to the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) on 10 December 1985 at column 568. I shall reply to the hon. Member giving figures for other years as soon as possible.

Deaf Children

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the provision of education for deaf children by local education authorities in circumstances where a local education authority is not prepared to support financially a successful candidate to schools such as the Mary Hare grammar school for the deaf or Burwood Park school.

Mr. Dunn: Local education authorities are required by the Education Act 1981 to make appropriate provisions for the education of children with special educational needs. An authority is under no obligation to support financially the education of such children at non-maintained schools if it can make satisfactory provision at one of it own maintained schools. The Authority's decision in any individual case does not remove a parent's rights of appeal to the Secretary of State under the provisions of the Education Act 1981, or of complaint under the Education Act 1944.

GCSE Examinations

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science which local education authorities and which examination groups have now requested a postponement of the introduction of GCSE examinations.

Mr. Chris Patten: For the local education authorities, I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to him on 17 February at column 14. Since then two further local education authorities, Birmingham and Stockport, have requested a postponement of the GCSE. Two of the five GCSE examining groups, the London and East Anglia group and the Welsh Joint Education Committee, have made a similar request.

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has about the proportion of general certificate of secondary education syllabuses which are now available to teachers for preparation of teaching materials for the next academic year.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which I gave to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) on 27 February, column 647.

Married Schoolgirls

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many married girls are currently receiving school education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Such information is not collected centrally.

Repairs and Maintenance

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, pursuant to his reply of 4 March, he will list the 32 local education authorities which have spent less in real terms in 1983-84, as measured by the gross domestic product deflator, on the repair and maintenance of schools and colleges, in comparison with 1982-83.

Mr. Dunn: The authorities are as follows:

Merton	Humberside
Suffolk	Lincolnshire
Kirklees	Barnet
Lancashire	South Tyneside
Walsall	West Sussex
North Tyneside	Redbridge
Hereford and Worcester	Durham
Birmingham	North Yorkshire
Calderdale	Isles of Scilly

PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Ronald Pelton

Dr. Owen asked the Prime Minister whether the case of Ronald Pelton, arrested by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in November 1985 and who worked for a time at the Government communications headquarters, has been referred to the Security Commission.

The Prime Minister: No.

Southern Africa

Mr. Caborn asked the Prime Minister whether she has agreed a date and venue with the Commonwealth Secretary-General and the Heads of Government of Zambia, Australia, the Bahamas, Canada, India, the United Kingdom and Zimbabwe for the meeting envisaged in paragraph seven of the Commonwealth accord on southern Africa adopted in October 1985.

The Prime Minister: No. The review referred to in the Commonwealth accord will take place in the context of developments in South Africa and the work of the group of eminent persons which is currently visiting South Africa.

Syrian Prime Minister and Foreign Minister

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister (1) if she will make a statement on her recent meeting with the Prime Minister of Syria.

(2) if the question of human rights in Syria was discussed at her recent meeting with the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Syria.

The Prime Minister: I had a meeting with the Foreign Minister of Syria, Mr. Farouk al-Shara', on 3 March, at which we discussed the Arab-Israel problem and other regional issues as well as terrorism. I sought the continued help of the Syrian Government in securing the release of Mr. Alec Collett held hostage in the Lebanon.

Mr. Shara' also met my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and was left in no doubt about the strong feelings in this country on the question of human rights in Syria.

Public Libraries and Museums

Mr. Cartwright asked the Prime Minister which Minister is currently responsible for carrying out the duties conferred by sections 1 and 10 of the Public Libraries and Museums Act 1964; and by what instrument that responsibility was last transferred.

The Prime Minister: The Minister for the Arts exercises day-to-day responsibility for these functions. Currently he acts on behalf of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, to whom the legal responsibilities were transferred by the Transfer of Functions (Arts, Libraries and National Heritage) Order 1984 (No. 1814). However the legal responsibilities will shortly be transferred to the Lord President of the Council, in line with the Minister for the Arts' position as Minister of State, Privy Council Office.

ENVIRONMENT

Association of Metropolitan Authorities Housing Committee

49. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he plans to meet the chairman of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities Housing Committee.

Mr. John Patten: I hope to discuss with him and the chairman of the Association of District Councils' housing and environmental health committee in the near future the additional allocations my Department is making available for capital schemes devised by local authorities in conjunction with the urban housing renewal unit; and to have a meeting with him and other representatives of the local authority associations about their proposals for reducing the level of rent arrears among their tenants.

BMX Cycle Track, Brixton

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what funding comes from his Department to the BMX cycle track in Brixton; and if he is satisfied with value for money for the project.

Sir George Young: The Department approved partnership funding for the BMX cycle track in Brixton in 1982. The scheme received a capital grant of £13,390, and a grant towards the annual running costs of £20,000.

The scheme has made a positive short-term use of an otherwise vacant council site. As the land is now required for housing, the organisers of this project, Brixton cycle club, are winding up its activities on the site.

I am satisfied that the project has provided value for money during the period of its urban programme funding.

British Nuclear Fuels Ltd.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will identify the section of the process at the British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. Sellafield works from which the matter discharged on 23 January originated; and if he will place in the Library a full and detailed flow diagram of the reprocessing operations overall, clearly identifying the location of the source of the discharged liquor.

Mr. Waldegrave: The section of the process from which uranium originated and was subsequently discharged on 23 January was the uranium finishing stage, where purified uranium solution is handled. A flow diagram of the overall reprocessing cycle will be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what filtering, mixing, dilution, conditioning and temperature adjustment was carried out on the relevant liquor before or during the operations at Sellafield to discharge it into the Irish sea on 23 January.

Mr. Waldegrave: In passing through the normal low active waste treatment stages, the uranium solution was diluted 25 times by water and other wastes, neutralised with ammonium hydroxide and screened to remove any flotsam, all at ambient temperature.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library copies of the monitoring records for the marine environments, sea and beaches, following the sea discharge of 23 January; and if he will make a statement assessing the hazards to the health of members of the public residing in the immediate area of the Sellafield plant, as a result of this discharge.

Mr. Gummer: I have been asked to reply.

My Department's assessment is that the discharge in question is unlikely to have any significant effect on the people most exposed to radioactivity from Sellafield since it amounted to only about one millionth of the annual limit allowed by the International Commission on Radiological Protection. My Department already undertakes a substantial monitoring programme, the results of which are published annually and placed in the Library. No additional monitoring is required on account of this discharge.

St. Barnabas Community Centre, Bristol

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the St. Barnabas community centre, Bristol, to be available for use by the local community; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The centre was completed by Avon county council in November 1984 and has been available for use since then. However, the St. Paul's community association declines to use the building until certain defects are remedied and improvements made.

Recently the county council, whose responsibility this is, submitted an application to my Department for extra funding and this is being considered. I understand that the county council expect the centre to be in full use towards the end of this year.

Homelessness

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what analysis has been made of the causes of homelessness; and what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to prevent homelessness occurring.

Sir George Young: A breakdown by reason for homelessness of households accepted by locl authorities under the Housing (Homeless Person) Act 1977 is contained in the tables published quarterly by the Department, copies of which are in the Library. I would refer the hon. Member also to the reply given on 30 January to a question by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker).—[Vol. 90, c. 610.]

The results of the latest research into homelessness carried out for my Department were published under the titles "Single and Homeless" (HMSO 1981) and "A Place for the Family" (SHAC 1982). Copies of these are also in the Library. Further research into homelessness is currently in hand.

A wide range of Government measures have been introduced to increase the availability of accommodation in both the public and the private sectors and we are currently considering additional measures which might help to relieve the problem of homelessness in this and other ways. The provision of housing advice by voluntary bodies at national and regional level is assisted by grants from my Department under section 13 of the Act.

Transitional Grant Support

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which projects run by voluntary bodies in the London borough of Waltham Forest will be eligible for transitional grant support after the abolition of the Greater London council; and what is the maximum amount in each case.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend has accepted the following projects as eligible for transitional grant support in the London borough of Waltham Forest, and for the maximum amounts specified. However, it is for Waltham Forest council to decide which of these organisations should receive support under the transitional grant scheme, and the precise sum to be allocated to each, up to the allocation limit of £267,000:

Afro-Caribbean Educational Project (Children)	22,400
Waltham Forest Centre for the Unemployed	50,400
Indian Muslim Federation Advisory Service and Youth Activities	38,300
Circle Services Ltd.—Neighbourhood Home Improvement Agency	30,680
Waltham Forest Toy Library	26,800
Asian Arts Council	21,000
Waltham Forest Chinese Association	7,300
Waltham Forest Victim Support Centre	35,000
Hollycats Play Project	38,450
Waltham Forest Girls Project/Afro-Caribbean Educational Project—Women's Project	40,000
Waltham Forest Women's Centre	50,000
Total	360,370

Empty Properties (Wirral)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on what grounds he has granted dispensation to Wirral councillors to vote on imposing a rate on empty property; and if he will detail the names and the party affiliation of those councillors requesting such dispensation.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has granted dispensations under section 97(1) of the Local Government Act 1972 to councillors D. A. Fletcher, T. Higgins, G. C. Lindsay and C. Whatling, three of whom I am informed are members of the Conservative group and one of the Liberal group on the metropolitan borough of Wirral.

These dispensations were granted in accordance with my criteria set out in the Department's circular 105/73.

Community Councils

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his plans following the Leavett review of rural community councils.

Mrs. Rumbold: The review was undertaken on behalf of the Development Commission which is now developing plans to take the recommendations forward in consultation with my Department.

House Building (Essex)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the acreage of land presently earmarked or zoned for building houses in Essex; and if he will express as a percentage of this the area of the site of special scientific interest land at West Mersea, Essex, in respect of which approval to construct houses has been granted after a planning inquiry.

Mr. Tracey: The Essex structure plan makes provision for 93,840 dwellings in the county between April 1977 and 1991. By mid 1985 about 60,200 dwellings had been constructed and there remained provision for about 33,600 dwellings. On the basis of a density of 30 dwellings per hectare, which it is the policy of the plan to achieve in estate housing development, this would amount to development of about 1,120 hectares of land. No decision has yet been given by my right hon. Friend on the planning applications in respect of the land at West Mersea to which the hon. Members refers. The area of the site in question is 0·32 hectares.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why he applied a section 29 order to land notified as a site of special scientific interest at West Mersea, Essex, in 1985; and if he will state the reason given by the inspector for his subsequent approval of an application to build houses on this land.

Mrs. Rumbold: The site, which had not at the time been notified as a site of special scientific interest, was under immediate threat. On the information then available the Secretary of State was satisfied that the site was of special interest and of national importance, and that it was appropriate to provide an extended period of protection for the area concerned by means of a nature conservation order. In the light of more detailed information available at the subsequent public inquiry, the Secretary of State concluded that the site could not be regarded as being of national importance as defined in section 29 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, and accordingly decided that the nature conservation order should be revoked.

The Secretary of State is currently considering the inspector's report on the related planning application and will announce his decision shortly.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the guidelines and advice offered to his Department's inspectors at inquiries which deal with planning applications involving sites of special scientific interest; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The planning inspectorate is kept well informed of developments in Government policy, including those relating to nature conservation.

Flower Meadows (West Mersea)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will take special measures to protect unimproved flower meadows such as that at West Mersea, Essex; and what information he has as to the acreage of meadows similar to that at West Mersea now left in Essex.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am satisfied that existing arrangements for notifying and protecting sites of special scientific interest, and for making nature conservation orders where appropriate, are adequate.

I am advised by the Nature Conservancy Council that there are approximately 52·6 hectares—130 acres—of grassland in Essex of the type found at the West Mersea site.

Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, in respect of those definitive maps and statements for which he has issued a direction to abandon a review under section 55(1) of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, the surveying authorities concerned have now completed the duty imposed on them by section 55(5) of the Act to modify the maps and statements to give effect to his decisions and to changes made by the draft revised definitive map which were not opposed; and, where the duty has not been complied with by any particular authority, what steps he proposes to take to ensure that it is completed during 1986.

Mrs. Rumbold: There is no requirement for surveying authorities to notify the Department of modifications made to their definitive maps and statements to give effect to such matters. My right hon. Friend has no power to require that the duty be fulfilled within a specified period. We are, however, exploring the possibility of arranging meetings with surveying authorities to discuss progress being made generally in implementing the definitive map review procedures in the 1981 Act.

Council of Environment Ministers' Meeting

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Council of Environment Ministers' meeting on 6 March.

Mr. Waldegrave: I represented the United Kingdom at this meeting.

The Council agreed the text of a proposed directive extending the implementation of the 1976 directive (76/464/EEC) on the discharge of dangerous substances to water. It includes a set of standard articles, and an annex with details of emission limit values and environmental quality standards which will be required for DDT, pentachlorophenol and carbon tetrachloride. The Council asked that the Commission should, in bringing forward further proposals for substances for inclusion in the annex, respect the criteria set out in the parent directive—toxicity, persistence, bioaccumulation — and give priority to substances likely to be present in Community waters at levels which cause particularly important environmental problems.

The Council also agreed the principles of a proposed directive amending the 1984 directive (84/631/EEC) on the transfrontier shipment of hazardous waste. The amendments would control movements of hazardous waste to countries outside the Community for disposal.

The Council held a preliminary exchange of views on priorities for the fourth environment action programme.

The Council reached a substantial measure of agreement on a proposed directive on the use of sewage sludge in agriculture, and gave further consideration to proposed directives on the control of polluting emissions from large combustion plants and on the sulphur content of gas oil.

The Council took note of an oral report by the Commission on preparations for the European Year of the Environment, which starts in March 1987.

Water Charges (Disabled Persons)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from Yorkshire water consumer consultative committees concerning the assessment of water charges for disabled persons; what action he proposes to assist disabled persons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend has received a letter which asks for rebates on water charges for disabled persons. It is the Government's view that assistance towards the financial needs for disabled persons is best provided through the social security system.

Countryside Commission

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the chairman of the Countryside Commission; and what subjects were discussed.

Mrs. Rumbold: My hon. Friend the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government and I met the chairman of the Countryside Commission on 3 February to discuss the report required under section 7(2) of the Local Government Act 1985.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the statement by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold), about additional rate support grant, 5 March, Official Report, column 321, what estimate his Department has made of the amount by which the rate announced by Dorset county council could be reduced directly as a result of the additional funds now being made available to Dorset, assuming the same level of expenditure and the same utilisation of balances.

Mrs. Rumbold: Dorset's share of the recycled grant is £6·409 million for 1986-87. This is equivalent to a rate poundage of 7p. The extent to which the council may be able to reduce its precept is dependent on the grant assumptions already made by the county.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the implications for Her Majesty's Government's policies towards the countryside of the abolition of the Greater London council and metropolitan counties and the consequent transfer of their powers relating to the countryside to successor authorities.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my hon. Friend gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on 25 February at column 490.

General Development Order

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the changes in the general development order which came into effect on 1 March.

Mr. Tracey: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friends the Members for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) and for Corby (Mr. Powell) on 20 December last at column 369-70.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Paymaster General what percentage of those registered as unemployed came from building and allied trades in (a) the borough of Hyndburn and (b) the north-west.

Mr. Lang: The results of the 1984 labour force survey indicate that in the north-west region in the spring of 1984, 6·6 per cent. of those people without a job and looking for work had been employed at some time in the last three years in the construction industry. Data on the industrial classification of the unemployed cannot be provided for areas smaller than standard regions because of the sampling error that would be involved.

Mr. Canavan asked the Paymaster General what is the total number of unemployed people in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lang: On 6 February 1986, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,381,893. This information is in the Library.

Mr. Janner asked the Paymaster General how many people in Leicester have been unemployed for more than one year.

Mr. Lang: On 9 January 1986, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, 9,148 claimants in the city of Leicester had been unemployed for more than one year. This information is in the Library.

Mr. Kennedy asked the Paymaster General what account is taken in compiling the unemployment figures of those whose small self-employed businesses have gone bankrupt and are therefore not eligible for unemployment benefit.

Mr. Lang: Some people are not entitled to unemployment benefit if they were self-employed in the tax year relevant to their claim, but many nevertheless claim supplementary benefit or national insurance credits and are therefore included in the monthly unemployment count. Recent analysis from the 1984 labour force survey has revealed that only small numbers of unemployed people who had previously been self-employed are excluded from the unemployment count.

Employment and Training Measures

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Paymaster General what is the latest total of people assisted by the employment and training measures; and what effect this has on the recorded unemployment figures.

Mr. Lang: At the end of January, some 668,000 people were benefiting from our employment and training measures. It is estimated that the effect of the special employment and training measures was to reduce the unemployment count by 495,000.

Women's Retirement Age

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Paymaster General what consideration he has now given to the consequences for public policy of the decision of the European Court of Justice on Wednesday 26 February relating to the retirement ages of women; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to a private notice question from the hon. Member for Kingston-upon-Hull East (Mr. Prescott) on 27 February, at column 1067. I am actively considering whether any amendments should be made to the Sex Discrimination Bill to clarify the law and comply with the EC equal treatment directive in the light of the judgment.

Trade Unions (Political Fund)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Paymaster General what steps he has taken to monitor the arrangements for the political fund ballots held under the Trade Union Act 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Certification Officer, an independent statutory officer, is responsible for approving the rules under which political fund ballots are conducted. I observe the working of the arrangements as reported in the press and other published material.

Gas Heaters

Ms. Harman asked the Paymaster General if he will undertake an advertising campaign to warn the public of the dangers of open flue gas heaters in bathrooms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: The British Gas Corporation tells me that it already runs publicity campaigns targeted particularly at areas where the remaining open flue gas heaters are mainly found. The number of heaters is diminishing and there are now very few incidents. Since 1980 British Gas regions have continuously advertised the need to have regular servicing. In addition, British Gas can stop dangerous appliances being used. The Health and Safety Executive has widely circulated its leaflet "The Gas Regulations for Everybody's Safety" which stresses the importance of competent servicing for gas appliances. The executive is also preparing a television reminder for public service broadcast.

Farm Workers (Safety Standards)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Paymaster General how many serious or fatal accidents involving farm employees were reported in 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Lang: The number of serious or fatal accidents involving agricultural employees in Great Britain reported to the Health and Safety Executive in each of the last three years is shown in the table below:

	Fatal	Serious
1983	28	183
1984	27	251
1985	*19	†

* Provisional.
† Not yet available.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Paymaster General which statutory bodies have a role in monitoring safety standards on farms and conditions of work for agricultural employees.

Mr. Lang: Employers have a duty to ensure the health, safety and welfare of agricultural employees so far as is reasonably practicable. Work at agricultural premises is subject to the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 and associated legislation. The Health and Safety Executive is the enforcing authority at these premises.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Paymaster General how many cases were brought against farmers, landowners or employers of agricultural labour for infringement of safety standards in 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively, by statutory bodies; and, in each year, what was the percentage of convictions.

Mr. Lang: The number of informations laid and convictions obtained against self-employed farmers and employers of agricultural labour for infringements of safety standards in each of the last three years is shown in the table:

	Informations laid	Convictions	Percentage
1983	165	139	86·9
1984	211	182	86·3
1985	267	210	78·0

ENERGY

Energy Efficiency

10. Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has any plans to promote the use of home energy audits.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department is continuing to work on the development of home energy audits at a price that the householder can afford.

15. Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Energy how he intends to monitor the effectiveness of Energy Efficiency Year.

Mr. Peter Walker: Energy Efficiency Year is just part of my campaign to save the 20 per cent. of our energy that is now being wasted. The level of response to our advertising campaign, attendances at our Monergy breakfast briefings and increases in the sales of energy efficiency goods and services will give some measure of the success of this campaign. The number of events taking place during the Year — well on course towards our target of 1,000—is another measure.

19. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Energy what progress is being made towards the formulation of a national energy policy.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: It remains the Government's aim that energy should be produced, supplied and used efficiently and economically.

22. Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Energy what progress has been made since 17 February in promoting energy efficiency measures in Energy Efficiency Year.

Mr. David Hunt: Our campaign is reaching every sector of the community. Since 17 February over 75 school plays have taken place as well as around 50 other events aimed at the domestic and industrial/commercial sectors. The Monergy '86 Roadshow is now at the Earls Court Ideal Homes exhibition and will visit nearly 200 town centres during the Year. Our major advertising campaign is continuing both on television and in the national and specialist press.

23. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has any plans for targeting energy efficiency measures on housing in the inner cities.

Mr. Peter Walker: No. My energy efficiency campaign is directed at all sectors of the economy.

32. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy what special measures will be made to make Energy Efficiency Year relevant to the needs of lower income households.

Mr. Peter Walker: I expect the number of voluntary sector insulation projects to double to around 400 as this programme, sponsored by the Manpower Services Commission and my Department, expands during Energy Efficiency Year. Over 100,000 more homes will be insulated, making a total of around a quarter of a million since the programme began. The programme will also create up to 6,000 jobs among the long-term unemployed.

In addition, low-income households can benefit from the advice and information on domestic energy efficiency measures, which has been made widely available by the Energy Efficiency Office; and many of the voluntary sector insulation projects also run individual energy counselling services.

36. Mr. Cunliffe asked the Secretary of State for Energy what provision he has made to increase the resources available to regional energy efficiency offices.

Mr. Peter Walker: The resources of regional energy efficiency offices have been increased substantially. Regional energy efficiency officers now have full-time assistants and clerical support and are able to draw on local professional assistance as required.

40. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about the progress in attaining objectives of the Monergy campaign.

Mr. David Hunt: Energy Efficiency Year aims to increase awareness and implementation of energy efficiency measures as a contribution to our campaign to save the 20 per cent. of our energy that is now being wasted. Our publicity programme including national press and television advertising has generated a substantial level of interest. We are well on course to achieve our original target of over 1,000 events during the Year—events run by private companies, the fuel industries and local authorities as well as the energy efficiency office. These events cover every sector and level of the community—including not only seminars for top executives but also courses for caretakers and plant operators and plays for schoolchildren.

Comrie Colliery, Fife

13. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will pay an official visit to Comrie colliery in Fife.

Mr. David Hunt: I have no plans at present to visit Comrie colliery.

Privatisation

16. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on his plans for privatisation of industries owned by his Department.

Mr. Goodlad: My right hon. Friend's legislative proposals for the privatisation of the British Gas Corporation are currently before the House.

Colliery Review Body

17. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he will next meet the chairman of the National Coal Board to discuss the workings of the modified colliery review body.

Mr. Peter Walker: The colliery review procedure is an agreement between the National Coal Board and mining unions, to which the Government are not a party.

Combined Heat and Power

18. Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he is satisfied with progress being made towards the development of combined heat and power in the United Kingdom as a basis for whole-city heating.

Mr. David Hunt: Yes, the consortia in Edinburgh, Belfast and Leicester are making good progress.

Energy Efficiency Office

20. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he intends to reply to the Energy Committee report on the Energy Efficiency Office.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Government have submitted their response to the Select Committee's report on the Energy Efficiency Office. I understand that the committee will publish the response later this week.

Oil Policy

21. Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on Government policy on oil in the light of the fall in prices; and what discussions he has had with oil companies.

Mr. Peter Walker: No. I have regular discussions with the oil companies on matters of mutual interest.

Electricity Industry

24. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Energy what have been the knock-on effects of closures in the coal mining industry on the electricity industry in the past 12 months.

Mr. David Hunt: The rationalisation of the coal industry coupled with a general reduction in operating costs is essential if the National Coal Board is to retain its position in the market for power station coal.

Sellafield

25. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Energy what recent representations he has received about recent incidents at Sellafield.

Mr. Goodlad: I have received a number of representations from Members of the House and from the general public.

North Sea Oil (Car Fuel)

26. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the proportion of fuel consumed in cars in the United Kingdom is derived from North sea oil.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I regret that the information is not available in this form. In 1985, 55 per cent. of crude oil run through United Kingdom refineries originated from the United Kingdom continental shelf.

NCB (Privatisation)

27. Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to meet the chairman of the National Coal Board to discuss the privatisation programme of the National Coal Board.

Mr. David Hunt: The Government have no plans for privatising the National Coal Board's mining activities.

Energy Needs

28. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Energy what percentage of United Kingdom energy needs is consumed in the domestic sector during winter months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Details of final energy consumption by user are not available on a monthly basis. In the last five financial years, however, the domestic sector accounted for about a third of final consumption during the two quarters from October to March inclusive, or about a fifth of total final consumption in each year as a whole.

Coal Industry

29. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the output of coal per manshift at the present time; and how this compares with the output per manshift in April 1979.

Mr. David Hunt: The latest figures available show that overall revenue deep-mined productivity reached 3·13 tonnes per man shift in the week ending 22 February 1986. This compares with an average of 2·20 tonnes per man shift for April 1979.

Sizewell

30. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to make a decision on the construction of a pressurised water reactor at Sizewell.

Mr. Peter Walker: I am anxious to make my decision as soon as possible after I have received the inspector's report. I regret the long period of uncertainty that has taken place and have offered the inspector all the administrative help that he requires to produce his report at the earliest possible date.

Energy Prices

31. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Energy what study his Department conducts of how energy prices paid by British industry compare with prices paid by similar industries in competing countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: My Department keeps a close watch on comparative industrial energy prices. United Kingdom interruptible gas prices are the lowest in Europe, and firm gas prices amongst the lowest. United Kingdom electricity prices, except those for some large users at high load factor, are generally favourable compared with those in Europe apart from France, where prices reflect lower nuclear and hydro-electric costs.

Magnox Power Stations

33. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his Department's latest estimate of the continued life of Magnox power stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The Central Electricity Generating Board has, for planning and accounting purposes, adopted an assumption of a 30-year life for each Magnox station. On the basis of current assessments the board expects actual operating lives to be at least as long as this.

North Sea Oil

34. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he is satisfied with the level of on-shore oil-related activity within the Scottish highlands; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Projects currently approved are generating good tonnage of work for the United Kingdom fabrication and construction yards. The Scottish Highlands yards are well placed to secure a share of this business provided their bids for it are competitive.

British Gas (Privatisation)

35. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether his plans for the privatisation of British Gas are affected by the fall in the oil price.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The offer for sale of shares in British Gas will take full account of prevailing market circumstances.

NCB (Drilling Exploration)

37. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, when he next meets the chairman of the National Coal Board, he will raise with him the results of the board's drilling exploration off the north-east coast.

Mr. David Hunt: I am aware of the National Coal Board's exploration programme off the north-east coast, and my right hon. Friend and I expect to discuss the results of this with the chairman of the board from time to time as the board's plans develop.

Renewable Sources of Energy

38. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much his Department has spent on research and development on renewable sources of energy in the last five years, compared to the spending in the five years 1974 to 1979.

Mr. David Hunt: Expenditure by my Department on research and development into the renewable sources of energy in the financial years 1980-81 to 1984-85 amounted to £68 million compared with £15·8 million in the period 1975-76 to 1979-80.

Colliery Review Procedure

39. Mr. Welsh asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he will next meet the chairman of the National Coal Board to discuss the new colliery review procedure.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer my right hon. Friend gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron).

Coal Industry (Mining Practices)

41. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy what proposals he has received or he now expects to receive from the National Coal Board in respect of changes in mining practice which will require changes in current regulations.

Mr. David Hunt: Proposals for new safety regulations are the responsibility of the Health and Safety Commission. Any such proposals are subject to an extensive process of consultation with all interested parties.

Atomic Energy Authority

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy on what basis certain employees of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority have been offered pay increases in the form of market premium payments; which categories of employees have received such offers; what those offers comprise; what were the criteria used for selection of these categories; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The principle of awarding special additions to pay in response to proven difficulties in recruiting and retaining staff with scarce skills is now well established. I am asking the chairman of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority to write to the hon. Member with details of the particular proposals to which he refers.

Electricity Tariffs (Industrial Consumers)

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will report progress on the implementation of the scheme proposed by the National Coal Board and the Central Electricity Generating Board to offer reduced electricity tariffs to large industrial consumers; and if he has any plans to introduce legislation to permit preferential supplies of coal or electricity.

Mr. Goodlad: Discussions are continuing between the electricity supply industry and the NCB on a possible commercial arrangement to supply lower cost electricity to very large industrial users. I have no plans at present to introduce legislation on preferential supplies of coal or electricity.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Gas Appliances (Safety)

50. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he is taking to ensure the safety standards of gas appliances imported into the United Kingdom.

Mr. Howard: I announced on 13 December that new regulations were to be prepared to ensure that both new and second-hand gas cookers sold in the United Kingdom meet proper safety standards. This will apply to both imported and home-produced goods. If I see a need for legislation for other gas appliances, I shall introduce it later.

EC (Trade Statistics)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give the present trade balance and deficit figures of the United Kingdom with each member of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Alan Clark: Statistics of United Kingdom trade with individual countries are not available on the balance of payments (BOP) basis. Figures on the overseas trade statistics (OTS) basis are in the table.

For comparison both OTS and BOP figures for the year 1985 are given for United Kingdom trade with the European Community as a whole.

Nissan (Washington Plant)

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Trade and industry (1) what approaches the Nissan company has made to Her Majesty's Government seeking to modify its earlier undertakings on local content levels in the cars assembled at Washington; and if he will make it his policy not to accede to any such approaches;

(2) whether he has had discussions with Nissan over that company's output plans for its new Washington plant; and when that company now proposes to achieve an output of 250,000 units per year.

Mr. Butcher: Nissan has made no proposals to change the terms of its Washington project. These remain as outlined in the heads of agreement between the company and the Department of Trade and Industry published in 1984. If Nissan proceeds to phase 2, production will commence by 1990 at 60 per cent. local content, rising to 80 per cent. not later than the first half of 1991. The output would be at least 100,000 vehicles per year. Any revisions Nissan might propose to the terms of the project would be considered on their merits.

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what commitment the Nissan company has made to export cars assembled at its Washington plant; and what proportion of United Kingdom output that company plans to export.

Mr. Butcher: Nissan does not expect to export vehicles from the United Kingdom in the first phase of its project. However, under phase 2 of the proposal, the company's commitment is that there should be substantial exports. The proportion of output exported will depend on market and other conditions at the time.

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list in the Official Report the amount of regional selective assistance given or offered under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 of £5,000 or more in each of the past three years and to date (a) nationally, (b) in the east midlands and (c) to Leicestershire; and if he will list all the benefiting companies and the amount received in each case by installations in the east midlands and Leicestershire.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Offers of regional selective assistance (RSA) of £5,000 or more in each of the last three years and to date in Great Britain, the east midlands region and Leicestershire are as follows:

£ thousand

	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86*

Takeover Bids

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what definition of the national interest he uses in deciding upon a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in the case of corporate takeover bids;

(2) if he will publish the criteria he uses in deciding upon references to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on company takeover bids.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry may make a reference to the commission where it appears to him that a merger proposal may have a bearing on the public interest. In making a decision on a reference, he takes into account the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading. The policy of the Government is to make references to the commission primarily on competition grounds. This does not, however, rule out the possibility of references on other public interest grounds. In assessing whether a merger proposal may raise public interest questions, my right hon. Friend is guided by the public interest criteria set out in section 84(1) of the Fair Trading Act 1973.

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the operation of the Fair Trading Act 1973 on corporate takeover bids; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: Yes. I am satisfied that the legislative and policy framework within which mergers are examined, in allowing for consideration of each case on its merits in the light of all the relevant circumstances, enables us to assess whether a proposal raises potential public interest questions which deserve further consideration by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Systime plc

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting regarding Systime plc held on 19 January 1983.

Mr. Pattie: No.

Exports (United States Controls)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken to seek to prevent the infringement of United Kingdom sovereignity by the operation of United States controls on exports from the United Kingdom of goods, including United States components or technology; how many individual cases regarding re-export controls he has taken up with the United States Government since 1983; in what circumstances he has not permitted United Kingdom companies to make a commercial decision as to whether to comply with United States re-export controls; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I continue to emphasise to the United States Administration the Government's objections to United States claims to extraterritorial controls over exports and to warn of the damaging consequences to our mutual interest of attempts to enforce such claims in the United Kingdom. We continue to make efforts to prevent or resolve problems arising from such claims under the consultation arrangements agreed by the United Kingdom and the United States Governments in November 1984. Since 1983 we have taken up about 20 cases with the United States authorities regarding re-export controls. In 1982, directions under the Protection of Trading Interests Act were made to prohibit seven United Kingdom firms from complying with the United States embargo on exports and re-exports of United States origin goods and technology destined for the west Siberian pipeline project in the USSR.

BL (Bids)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will tabulate for General Motors and all the other bidders for parts of BL, information in so far as it relates to their bids, which indicates whether (a) the bidder was allowed to visit all or any of the BL premises, (b) permission was given to meet the plant management, (c) permission was given to meet the unions at each plant and (d) he has received any notification of dissatisfaction, by any of the bidders, about lack of availability of assistance or information in assembling their bids.

Mr. Peter Morrison: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry told the House on 3 February, discussions with General Motors have reached an advanced stage. In order to examine the possibility of bringing together the BL and Bedford truck and van businesses, representatives of GM have visited Leyland Trucks and Freight Rover and have met some of the management. GM representatives have not visited the Land Rover plant at Solihull but they have met some of the Land Rover management in the course of general discussions with BL. GM has not held discussions with trade union representatives of the BL businesses. The position regarding other bidders for these businesses is set out below.

The Government are satisfied that all other commercial parties interested in all or part of the Land Rover, Freight Rover, Leyland Trucks and related businesses, who were willing to enter into the normal confidentiality agreements, have received appropriate information from BL's advisers, Hill Samuel, in order to enable them to decide whether or not to declare a firm intention to make a bid.

As my right hon. Friend told the House on 6 March, Hill Samuel has offered a meeting to Lancashire Interprises Ltd. to explain further the nature of its proposals following its preliminary expression of interest on 4 March. I understand that a meeting is taking place today (10 March) with representatives of Lancashire Enterprises Ltd. and the West Midlands enterprise board, on whose behalf the preliminary expression of interest was also made.

I understand that Lonrho and Aveling Barford have expressed dissatisfaction to Hill Samuel about the time scale in which they were asked to decide whether or not to declare a firm intention to bid, the level of financial information made available and the lack of access to premises and to plant management. The Land Rover management buy-out team led by Mr. David Andrews has, however, written to me observing that the time scale was very short but that an early decision is required in order to avoid commercial uncertainties damaging the businesses.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Horses (Docked Tails)

Mr. Greenway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what steps he takes to seek to ensure the enforcement of the provisions discouraging the importation of horses with docked tails; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what recent representations he has received about the incidence of the docking of horses' tails; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The import of horses with docked tails is controlled under the Docking and Nicking of Horses Act 1949.

Instructions have been issued to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise officials at points of entry to prevent such imports except where a licence has been issued by my Department in respect of an animal for breeding, or where the animal will be re-exported as soon as practicable under Customs control. No licences for breeding purposes have been issued since 1980.

Members of the state veterinary service have also been instructed to report on any docked horses found at markets and sales. Anyone convicted for failing to comply with the legislation is liable to a heavy fine or imprisonment.

My Department has not received any recent representations on horse tail docking.

Pesticides

Mr. Hawksley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the pesticides safety precautions scheme has given approval for the use of Mowchem in public parks and on verges.

Mr. Gummer: Mowchem — active ingredient mefluidide — currently has provisional commercial clearance under the pesticides safety precautions scheme for use as a grass growth retardant on industrial and non-crop land. This clearance permits its use on verges and in amenity areas such as public parks.

Mowchem is also approved for efficacy under the agricultural chemicals approval scheme.

Advisory Committee on Pesticides

Sir Richard Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether any member of the Advisory Committee on Pesticides has ever received a fee as a consultant or for research from a company manufacturing pesticides; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Given the number of eminent scientists who have contributed to the work of the Advisory Committee on Pesticides since its inception in 1954—then titled the Advisory Committee on Poisonous Substances used in Agriculture and Food Storage—it is not practicable to provide the information requested.

However, my hon. Friend can be assured that great care has always been taken to ensure that members of advisory committee do not have any financial or commercial interests which would be likely to prejudice the proper discharge of their functions as members of the committee and the existing membership have all signed a declaration to that effect.

Nutritional Labelling

Mr. Murphy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representation he has received advocating compulsory nutritional labelling; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: We have received a number of representations advocating compulsory nutrition labelling of food. We are currently seeking comments on proposals to make the labelling of total and saturated fats compulsory, and on draft guidelines for voluntary wider nutrition labelling.

Agricultural Land

Mr. Cash asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress is being made in revising the current guidelines on the use of agricultural land so as to facilitate its use in appropriate circumstances for other purposes in the light of current production levels.

Mr. Gummer: There is little I can add to the answer given to my hon. Friend on 6 February. The Government remain committed to their policy for the protection of agricultural land. We do, however, recognise the need to strike a balance between competing interests and in responding to requests from planning authorities for advice on development proposals we try to adopt a flexible approach.

Horses (Slaughter)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the number of horses slaughtered in each of the last five years; and what meat has been sold for human consumption.

Mr. Gummer: These statistics are not collected. Little horsemeat is produced for human consumption in the United Kingdom. However, in 1985 5,545 tonnes of horsemeat were exported from the United Kingdom to the member states of the European Community.

Labour Statistics

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, pursuant to his reply of 10 February, Official Report, column 377, he will state what percentage of farms in the United Kingdom employ (a) one to five hired workers, (b) five to 10 hired workers and (c) over 10 hired workers; and if he will state the equivalent figures for Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland and each of the standard regions in England.

Mr. Gummer: This information will take some time to extract and collate. I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Dairy Produce (Export Subsidy)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if the decision of the European Economic Community Commission to cease publishing the amount of subsidy given for exports of dairy produce is subject to the agreement of the management committee and whether this change of policy by the Commission applies to other products outwith the dairy sector;

(2) if he will seek to establish from the European Economic Commission the reasons why they have decided not to publish the appropriate rates of subsidy given for dairy exports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Export refunds in the dairy sector are and will continue to be published, usually on a monthly basis. The Commission has however, recently stated that in the light of market conditions the rates for butter, butteroil and skimmed milk powder may be varied according to destination at short notice and for short periods. Rates set in this way will not be published but will be notified directly to member states which are responsible for passing the information on to the trade. The published rates will continue to apply to all other products and destinations.

The explanation given by the Commission for this change in procedure is the need to strengthen the Community's position on the world market by making it more difficult for competitors to undercut Community prices.

The Commission's action is based on the provision of article 17.5 of regulation 804/68 which says that where necessary the Commission may alter the refunds between meetings of the management committee. It does not apply to products outside the dairy sector.

European Community (Food Sales)

Mr. Craigen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consideration he has given to procuring the sale of European Economic Community surplus food stored in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Gummer: Day to day management of the common agricultural policy, including the disposal of intervention stocks, is the responsibility of the European Commission which consults member states through the commodity management committees. The United Kingdom is represented on these committees and takes an active part in encouraging cost-effective measures to dispose of stocks.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how the representative of Her Majesty's Government on the management committee voted on the proposal to offer further supplies of butter at special prices to the Soviet Union, India and Pakistan on 28 February; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Our basic objective remains to tackle the problem of costly surpluses at source. However, while they continue to exist the cheapest way of disposing of them is often to sell them on the world market with the benefit of export refunds. These refunds bridge the gap between Community and world prices and are not a mechanism to provide importing countries with cheap food. Where there are surpluses for export the Government remain opposed to singling out any particular country for special treatment. The proposal presented by the Commission at the management committee on 28 February, did not restrict sale to a particular destination. The United Kingdom representative therefore voted in favour.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the cost of the special sale of butter announced by the European Commission on 28 February is included in the agricultural budget for 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: There is no specific provision for this sale in the 1986 budget, but there are provisions for disposal measures and export refunds generally which could be used. However, the Commission has stated that it considers that extra funds will be required in 1986 for the disposal of butter stocks.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what estimate has been made by the European Commission of the cost of the special sales of butter announced on 28 February;

(2) pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) of 3 March, Official Report, column 10, what was the quantity of butter which the Commission agreed on 28 February to sell to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, India and Pakistan, respectively; and if the tender prices will be made public.

Mr. Gummer: The proposed sale of intervention butter announced on 28 February, involves a system of competitive tendering to determine the amount of the price reduction. The first invitation to tender will now close on 24 March. It is not possible to give any details of quantities, price or destination or to say whether such sales will in fact take place until the results of the tender are known.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of the total tonnage of food exported to third countries by the European Economic Commission was sent to East Europe, including the Soviet Union, in the most recent annual period for which figures are available; and what were the comparable percentages in each of the previous 10 years.

Mr. Gummer: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Bob Clay asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total amount to date of payments made to farmers under the exceptional weather aid scheme.

Mr. Jopling: To date, payments made to farmers in England under this scheme amount to £3·25 million.

Mr. Clay asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the administrative costs involved in implementing the exceptional weather aid scheme.

Mr. Jopling: I estimate that the administrative costs of this scheme in England will amount to about £100,000.

Mr. Clay asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps were taken and what costs were incurred in publicising the exceptional weather aid scheme.

Mr. Jopling: The scheme was publicised by press releases, supplemented by various forms of local publicity in the areas concerned. In addition, a leaflet explaining the scheme was sent to every potential applicant. I estimate that the total costs were about £5,000.

Hormones

Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his policy towards the European Economic Community on the question of hormones.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 3 March 1986, c. 8]: The Government have today made an application to the European Court of Justice seeking annulment of the EC directive banning the use of hormone growth promoters. This action reflects our objections to the basis upon which this directive was adopted, including the lack of regard for relevant scientific evidence.

In taking this action in the European Court, the Government do not seek to discourage producers who wish to rear animals without the use of added hormones. Until a ban is implemented, this remains a matter for commercial decision of individual farmers.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Group Accident Insurance

Mr. McWilliam asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what changes have been made to right hon. and hon. Members' group accident insurance arrangements.

Mr. Beith: The death and capital benefits available under the terms of the policy have been increased to £89,000 as from 1 January 1986. I will arrange for the memorandum by the Accountant, which gives details of the cover and exclusions to be placed in the Library.

Palace of Westminster (Floor Area)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will give the most recent figures showing the amount of space occupied in the Palace of Westminster by the Commons and Lords, respectively.

Mr. Biffen: The total floor area of the Palace of Westminster is approximately 790,000 sq ft. An approximate division between the two Houses is 530,000 sq ft for the House of Commons and 260,000 sq ft for the House of Lords. Precise figures could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

THE ARTS

Tax Settlements

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts (1) whether he will list, giving the relevant references in the Official Report, those occasions on which the amounts of estate duty or capital transfer tax satisfied by the acceptance of objects or land in respect of individual cases have been specified in written answers during the period between the financial years 1976-77 and 1984-85;

(2) what steps he took to verify the accuracy of the information in relation to the dates of recommendations by the Museums and Galleries Commission for acceptances in satisfaction of tax on which his answer of 26 February, Official Report, column 593, was based; and if he now has anything to add to that answer;

(3) if he will specify, giving the relevant references in the Official Report, the occasions on which it has been stated to the House since 1979 and prior to his answer to the hon. Member for Warley, East of 26 February, Official Report, column 593, that the amounts of estate duty or capital transfer tax satisfied by the acceptance of objects or land is confidential in respect of individual cases;

(4) why, in the light of his answers of 13 February, Official Report, column 502, and 26 February, Official Report, column 593, indicating that £505,650 had been accounted for out of a total original provision of £2 million in respect of items of heritage quality accepted in lieu of tax, it was necessary to increase the cash limit on class V, vote 10 in relation to expenditure under subhead C2; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Works of Art (Exports)

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts if he will state for each year since 1979 the length of time which elapsed between the end of the year to which successive reports of the Reviewing Committee on the Export of Works of Art related and the publication of the relevant report; to what factors he attributes the length of these periods and the trend shown by them; and what steps he is taking to reduce the time taken to publish these reports.

Mr. Luce: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

British Council

Mr. Cabom asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the Government's attitude to British Council funding for British sport coaches being sent to South Africa.

Mr. Eggar: It is our policy to discourage sporting contact with South Africa. In line with this policy the British Council does not make funds available to send sports coaches to South Africa.

Nuclear Tests

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to obtain from the United States Government the Natural Resources Defence Council's report on unannounced United States nuclear tests.

Mr. Renton: Copies of the report are readily available from the Natural Resources Defence Council itself in Washington.

Syria

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on current relations between Her Majesty's Government and Syria.

Mr. Renton: Our relations with Syria are sound. There are no current bilateral problems. The recent visit of the Syrian Foreign Minister enabled us to continue our exchange of views on regional issues.

Nuclear Test Ban Treaty

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), 6 December 1985, Official Report, column 385, what effects he assesses the conclusion of a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty in 1986 would have upon the Trident nuclear warhead testing programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: These would depend on the terms and conditions of an agreement, which remains a hypothetical question.

Zimbabwe

Sir Peter Emery asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will take an initiative to seek to persuade the Government of Zimbabwe to transfer to British citizens who have left Zimbabwe to return to Britain the annual interest payments on their investments currently blocked by the Zimbabwean Government; and if he will seek to establish a schedule of repayment of these funds and investments which gives priority in repayment to the needs of those who are aged and those who have only small amounts requiring repayment.

Mrs. Chalker: Since March 1984 individual holders of assets blocked in Zimbabwe have been able to purchase Government of Zimbabwe 4 per cent. external bonds, which permit the remittance of capital, with interest, over a 12-year period.

The Zimbabwean authorities have also made special provisions for holders of blocked funds who are elderly, sick or suffering other exceptional hardship. They are well aware of our concern that those in the greatest need should receive special attention. My right hon. and learned Friend last discussed this matter with the Zimbabwean Foreign Minister in February.

Apartheid and Human Rights

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his most recent discussion with the South African Government on apartheid and human rights.

Mrs. Chalker: We have made very clear to the South African Government on a number of occasions recently, both here and in South Africa, our deep concern on human rights and the need to eliminate apartheid. These were among the issues discussed when my right hon. and learned Friend met the South African ambassador on 13 February.

Central America

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what view Her Majesty's Government have expressed to the United States of America about the current situation in Central America and especially Nicaragua.

Mr. Eggar: As I said at column 177 in reply to a question by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) on 5 March, we regularly discuss all important issues, including the situation on Central America, with the United States Government at a number of levels. They are fully aware of our views.

United States Embassy

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Mr. Timothy Deal or Mr. Jack Lacey are currently accredited diplomats at the United States embassy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Mr. Jack Lacy is at present a member of the diplomatic staff at the United States embassy in London. Mr. Timothy Deal's appointment ended on 6 June 1985.

Diplomats (Private Education Costs)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will detail for the last 10 years the costs and number of employees covered in his Department's scheme for helping the Diplomatic Corps defray the costs of private education of their children; and if he will break down the costs according to whether they involved the payment of fees, the covering of fares, or any other costs.

Mr. Eggar: Since 1979 the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has employed three officials to administer boarding school allowances. At 1985 salary costs this amounts to £35,169 per annum. From 1980 to April 1984 four officials made all the travel arrangements for the Diplomatic Service. Twenty-five per cent. of their time involved arrangements for the travel of children of Diplomatic Service parents at boarding school. At 1985 costs this amounted to £12,911. Since the establishment of a Thomas Cook travel centre in the FCO in April 1984 only 10 per cent. of the time of one official has been devoted to travel arrangements for children of Diplomatic Service parents at boarding school. At 1985 costs this amounts to £1,291 per annum. The information for the period before 1979 for the administration of boarding school allowances and before 1980 for travel costs is not readily available and can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

TRANSPORT

Stansted Airport

Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has completed his consideration of the British Airport Authority's proposal to develop Stansted airport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The British Airports Authority submitted to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 31 October 1985 its proposals for the development of Stansted airport in accordance with the planning consent given by my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Environment and for Transport in June 1985.

The authority proposes to construct in the first phase a terminal capable of handling up to 8 million passengers a year, together with the associated infrastructure necessary to support this volume of traffic. The proposals meet the conditions which were attached to the planning consent.

The traffic forecasts used by the authority in its financial appraisal are consistent with those set out in the White Paper on airports policy (Cmnd. 9542) published in June 1985. They confirm that the additional terminal capacity will be required by 1991 in order to meet expected demand in the south-east, and that the number of passengers using the proposed new facilities at Stansted is likely to reach 8 million in 1995, only four years after it is planned to commission the new terminal.

The authority has estimated the cost of the proposed development at £290 million (at October 1985 prices). This expenditure will be spread over nine years.

This investment should meet the required rate of return for public sector investment, and I have today given my approval both to the BAA's proposal to start work on the construction of the new terminal facilities at Stansted in April (subject to its obtaining planning approval of the local authorities concerned) and to the estimated expenditure of £33 million on this project in 1986-87.

Driver-only Buses (Traffic Flows)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the effect on traffic flows in built-up areas of the use of driver-only buses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend has not himself commissioned such an assessment, but London Regional Transport incorporates congestion effects into its cost-benefit appraisal of conversions to one-person operation.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether the forthcoming legislation on the Channel fixed link will include the need to cater for a road link at some stage as mentioned in article 1 of the treaty between the United Kingdom and France.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. It is intended that the forthcoming legislation should cover only the existing Channel Tunnel Group-France-Manche proposal and that fresh powers would be required for the construction of a road link at a later stage.

British Rail Engineering Ltd.

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he has any plans to meet the chairman of the British Railways Board to discuss the proposed re-structuring of British Rail Engineering Limited with particular regard to the implications for British Rail as future maintenance of railway rolling stock is concerned;

(2) if he plans to meet the chairman of British Rail Engineering Limited to discuss the implications of the proposed restructuring of British Rail Engineering Limited with particular regard to any possible redundancies arising from those proposals;

(3) if he has any plans to visit the British Rail Engineering Limited workshops at Eastleigh, Wolverton, Glasgow and Doncaster in the light of the proposed restructuring of British Rail Engineering Limited;

(4) if he is satisfied that British Rail Engineering Limited will have the resources to tender for the construction of new railway vehicles arising from Her Majesty's Government's decision to allow the construction of the Channel fixed link and particularly in the light of British Rail Engineering Limited's proposed reconstruction.

Mr. David Mitchell: The British Railways Board has been reviewing the whole of its repair and maintenance arrangements, including the future of BREL, and the chairman of the board is keeping us in touch with progress. The board is confident that the new maintenance arrangements will improve efficiency within the railways and that restructuring BREL will help make the company more competive in seeking future orders, including those relating to the Channel tunnel. The implications of the restructuring for individual BREL workshops are management matters for the board and BREL, and these details are now being worked out. I have visited all the BREL workshops since 1983; I have no immediate plans for further visits.

Public Service Vehicles

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report by operator group, the numbers of public service vehicles which (a) failed the annual test for each traffic area in Great Britain for each year from 1982-83 onwards and (b) failed the annual test for each traffic area in Great Britain after rectification of minor faults, for each year from 1982-83 onwards.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall answer this question shortly.

Gliders

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to permit gliders to enter controlled airspace at specified entry and exit points.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Gliders are at present permitted to cross airways in visual meteorological conditions by day without compliance with normal air traffic control rules. This anomaly is causing concern among airways users, and a solution to the problem is under discussion within the forum of the National Air Traffic Management Advisory Committee.

Gliders are also permitted to enter some, but not all, control areas, control zones and special rules zones; such access is not normally limited to specific entry or exit points.

The National Air Traffic Services (NATS) has no plans to permit additional access by gliders to existing regulated airspace.

When new regulated airspace needs to be created, the question of access by gliders is considered in the light of local circumstances, and appropriate concessions are made if this is possible.

Okehampton Bypass

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, in the light of the decision of Her Majesty's Government taken subsequent to the decision of the Joint Committee on the Okehampton Bypass Special Procedure Order to promote an Order Confirmation Bill to reverse the decision of the Joint Committee on that order, he will now reimburse the objectors to that order who petitioned against it in Parliament the costs they incurred in so doing, notwithstanding the fact that no application was made to the Joint Committee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: The objectors made no application to the joint committee, which had the power to award costs: I see no grounds for reopening the matter now.

Pilots and Drivers (Working Hours)

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list in the Official Report the maximum working hours of (a) civil airline pilots, (b) heavy goods vehicle drivers and (c) public service vehicle drivers.

Mr. Ridley: Flight time limitation on air crews is the responsibility of the Civil Aviation Authority. I am sure the chairman would respond to any questions from the hon. Gentleman. The maximum duty hours for drivers of most goods vehicles over 3·5 tonnes gvw within the United Kingdom are 11 hours per day and 60 hours per week, with up to 14 and 66 hours allowed for certain special needs. Most PSV drivers on local services are subject to a limit of 16 hours on the working day; most other PSV drivers are required to take a rest period that limits the working day to 14 hours. Special rules apply to double manning and to international passenger traffic.

Airports (Radar)

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the current standards of surveillance radar approach at United Kingdom airports.

Mr. Ridley: Standards of surveillance radar approaches at airports in the United Kingdom are laid down in the "Manual of Air Traffic Services", part 1, section 3, chapter 2, paragraph 13, issued by the National Air Traffic Services (NATS), which I will send to the hon. Member. NATS is also responsible for examining individual controllers to ensure that they are fully competent before validating their licences for use at a particular aerodrome. The proper standards are being maintained.

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will meet the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority to discuss the safety of surveillance radar approach for talking down aircraft being interrupted.

Mr. Ridley: No. I do not wish to detract from the CAA's sole responsibility for aircraft safety. It has informed me it has no knowledge of any hazard to safety resulting from an interruption to a surveillance radar approach.

Air Traffic Controllers (Working Hours)

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will meet the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority to discuss the safety aspect of air traffic controllers' working hours.

Mr. Ridley: The CAA has advised me there are no statutory maximum working hours for air traffic controllers in the United Kingdom. It would be impracticable to define levels which would be appropriate for every airport, bearing in mind the widely variable intensity of operation throughout the United Kingdom. Rostering of controllers is the responsibility of local management, with the advice of the NATS inspectorate of ATC.

Shipping Statistics

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of ships, giving tonnage, which have (a) sunk, and (b) requested assistance in each of the following sea areas (i) Pentland Firth, (ii) Minch, (iii) Little Minch, (iv) sea of the Hebrides and (v) North Channel since 1980; and of these if he will state how many in each case were crude oil-carrying tankers.

Mr. Ridley: I shall answer this question shortly.

BP Shipping

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what representations he has received about BP Shipping company's decision to transfer 26 of its ships to the Bermudan flag; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will make representations to the BP Shipping Company Ltd. about the transfer of 26 of its vessels to the Bermudan flag; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have had letters from hon. Members and from the NUS and NUMAST expressing concern about the implications. Officials of my Department have had several exchanges with the company about its plans and about the legal position, and with NUMAST about the proposals in general. But the decision to transfer these vessels from the United Kingdom register is for the company, and I have no powers to prevent it.

Manchester International Airport

Mr. Couchman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total value of Government subsidy given to Manchester international airport since it was formed in 1956.

Mr. Michael Spicer [pursuant to the reply, 7 March 1986, c. 312]: According to readily available records, under the financial provisions of the 1955 municipalisation agreement (long since terminated) the Government paid grants of some £3 million towards the cost of airport developments. Under the same agreement the Government incurred costs of a similar order in providing navigation services to the airport free of charge.

East London River Crossing

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made on plans for a new east London river crossing.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I will answer this question shortly.

DEFENCE

Air Training Ship

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the air training ship.

Mr. Lee: The conversion of the merchant vessel Contender Bezant into its new role of aviation training ship is complex and is running slightly behind schedule. We hope the shipbuilder will be able to make good this delay.

Gibraltar (Visiting Warships)

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list by country and class the number of warships to visit the British base in Gibraltar in the last five years.

Mr. Stanley: Full records of visits by warships to Gibraltar are not generally retained. However, in the time available, the following information can be provided about visits by warships other than those of the Royal Navy:

Overseas Bases (Visiting Aircraft)

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list by country and type the number of visiting aircraft to visit British bases abroad in the last five years.

Mr. Stanley: This information could not be provided except at disproportionate cost.

Royal Yacht Britannia

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if firms in the rest of the European Economic Community will be able to tender for any refit of Her Majesty's yacht Britannia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the statement I made to the House on 6 February at column 530 in which I confirmed that HMY Britannia would be refitted in the United Kingdom.

Hospitals and Rehabilitation Centres

Mr. Richard Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will name the hospitals and rehabilitation centres for which he is responsible; whether he will give the dates on which they were last inspected for breaches of food hygiene procedures; and whether the person responsible for any such inspection was a qualified environmental health officer.

Mr. Lee: There are 19 active hospitals and one rehabilitation centre for the Armed Forces in the United Kingdom and overseas. They are:

United Kingdom

Royal Naval Hospital Haslar
Royal Naval Hospital Plymouth
Cambridge Military Hospital Aldershot
Duchess of Kent Military Hospital Catterick
Queen Elizabeth Military Hospital Woolwich
Military Wing Musgrave Park Hospital Belfast
Royal Air Force Hospital Ely
Princess Mary's RAF Hospital Halton
Princess Alexandra Hospital RAF Wroughton
Defence Services Medical Rehabilitation unit Headley Court

Overseas

Royal Naval Hospital Gibraltar
British Military Hospital Berlin
British Military Hospital Hanover
British Military Hospital Rinteln
British Military Hospital Dharan
British Military Hospital Hong Kong
British Military Hospital Falklands
The Princess Mary's Hospital Akrotiri
Royal Air Force Hospital Wegberg

The commanding officers are responsible for all aspects of hygiene including food handling procedures; inspections are undertaken regularly and routinely and the appropriate standards of hygiene are maintained as advised by qualified environmental health officers. In addition, they are inspected annually, and on other unannounced occasions by qualified environmental health officers.

Underground Nuclear Tests

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best), 18 December 1985, Official Report, column 212, if he will set out the reasons why it is not in the national interest to identify the purpose of any joint United States of America and United Kingdom underground nuclear test or the weapons programme it supports.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The association of a nuclear test with a specific project would enable a potential enemy to acquire classified information which would jeopardise the effectiveness of our deterrent. Consequently it has long been the policy of successive Governments to classify very highly all details other than those provided to the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) in the Official Report of 18 December 1985. at column 216, and in official press releases.

Departmental Establishments (Byelaws)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence why, in section 2, subsection f, of the proposed byelaws relating to RAF Brawdy, RAF Caerwent and ROF Llanishen, he introduced the offence of obstructing any other person acting in the proper exercise or execution of his duty.

Mr. Lee: Sub-paragraph 2*(f)* of the proposed byelaws is required to prevent a duly authorised person from being obstructed in carrying out his proper duty at the establishment concerned.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence which establishments under his Department's control have been, or are to be, the subject of byelaws under the Military Land Act 1892 similar to those proposed for RAF Brawdy, RAF Caerwent and ROF Llanishen.

Mr. Lee: A total of 326 sets of byelaws, including revisions, have been made regulating individual military ranges, training areas and establishments under the Military Lands Act 1892. In the last five years 17 sets have been made at the following places:

1986
Faslane, Coulport and Rhu Narrows

1985
Upper Hulme Range
RAF Greenham Common
RAF Molesworth
RAF Alconbury

1984
British Underwater Test and Evaluation Centre
Bellerby Moor and Wathgill Ranges

1983
Ash Ranges
Kibworth Ranges
Purfleet Ranges

1982
Longmoor Ranges and Demolition Training Area
Proof and Experimental Establishment, Eskmeals
Tregantle Ranges

1981
Her Majesty's Naval Base, Portsmouth
Proof and Experimental Establishment, Pendine
Salisbury Plain Military Lands
Warcop Principal Training Area

In addition to RAF Brawdy, RAF Caerwent and ROF Cardiff, plans exist to introduce similar byelaws at a further 17 sites in due course. Military byelaws remain under regular review, and will be made or revised as necessary.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence why he has proposed the latest byelaws relating to ROF Llanishen, RAF Caerwent and RAF Brawdy.

Mr. Lee: To regulate the use of the lands concerned for the military purposes for which they are appropriated; to safeguard the public from any dangers arising; and to prevent interference with the proper functioning of the establishments.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received concerning the proposed byelaws relating to RAF Caerwent, ROF Llanishen and RAF Brawdy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Six letters have been received concerning the proposed byelaws for RAF Caerwent, 14 for ROF Llanishenand 16 for RAF Brawdy. Ministers will consider these before deciding what form the byelaws will take.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence why the prohibited activities under the proposed byelaws relating to RAF Caerwent, RAF Brawdy and ROF Llanishen include the distribution or display of various objects and the affixing of them to either side of the perimeter fence.

Mr. Lee: Security patrols may be hindered from carrying out their duties if objects — including large posters, flags, banners, etc.—are fixed to the perimeter fence. It is important that no obstruction of the perimeter fence should occur which may obscure sight of unlawful acts which have been, are being or are about to be committed on Ministry of Defence property. Distribution and display of certain material could, in some circumstances, act as an incitement to unlawful action.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence why the protected areas in the proposed byelaws relating to RAF Brawdy, RAF Caerwent and ROF Llanishen include land outside the establishments concerned.

Mr. Lee: The proposed byelaws apply only to land owned by the Secretary of State for Defence or over which he has a right to control public activity.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many weeks are usually allowed for objections to be made to proposed byelaws under part II of the Military Lands Act 1892.

Mr. Lee: Three.

Service Families (Education Costs)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will detail for the last 10 years the cost of helping parents of service families defray the costs of places in private education of their children, whether through reimbursement of fees or other expenses, the rank of the serving parent or parents to which this help has been given and the cost of the scheme, classified in total and according to the rank of the serving parent or parents.

Mr. Lee: The cost of boarding school allowance for members of the Armed Forces for each of the last 10 years was as follows:

	£ million
1976-77	29·00
1977-78	33·00
1978-79	32·00
1979-80	35·00
1980-81	42·30
1981-82	60·00
1982-83	66·30
1983-84	76·50
1984-85	78·00
1985-86	*83·85

* Estimated outturn.

The sums listed above also include payments to the parents of children attending boarding school run by local education authorities. It is not possible to provide a precise breakdown, but it is estimated that about one fifth of the 21,500 children for whom boarding school allowance is being drawn at present are attending such schools.

Boarding school allowance may be drawn by any member of the Armed Forces while serving on a regular commission or engagement and the rate of allowance is the same for all ranks. Information on the cost of the boarding school allowance scheme by rank cannot be provided since such a breakdown of expenditure is not maintained.

Computers

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence what computers, other than minicomputers, have been ordered by the Ministry of Defence for administrative and general purposes since December 1983 stating the supplier, model and number of each processor ordered and the cost of each processor.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 21 February 1986, c. 379]: The following mainframe machines have been ordered since 1 January 1984:

Manufacturer	Type	Number
ICL	2966	11
ICL	2988	2
ICL	2957	3
ICL	2958	2
ICL	Atlas 10	2
IBM	3083	3

Costs are not given because it is a long-standing practice of the Ministry of Defence to treat details of individual contract prices as commercially confidential.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the budget of the Scottish Development Agency for 1986-87; and how this compares in real terms with (a) its original budget for 1985-86 and (b) its estimated outturn expenditure for 1985-86.

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the proposed remit for the functioning of the combined Macauley Institute for Soil Research/Hill Farming Research Organisation, recommended to him by the steering group; and if this will be available for full public discussion.

Mr. John MacKay: No. Definition of the proposed remit is only one element of the work of the steering group and it would not be appropriate to have public discussion on interim stages of the group's deliberations, although consultation with bodies having a direct interest are being undertaken. The remit will be made publicly available as part of the overall report of the group.

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will now appoint trade union representatives from each of the Macauley Institute for Soil Research and Hill Farming Research Organisation to the steering group set up to investigate the future of a combined Macauley Institute of Soil Research/Hill Farming Research Organisation.

Mr. John MacKay: The purpose of the steering group is to make recommendations on the implementation of those aspects of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland strategy paper on agricultural research and development relating to the Macaulay Institute for Soil Research, the Hill Farming Research Organisation, the Scottish Crop Research Institute and the specialist soils advisory and related work of the Scottish agricultural colleges. All of these bodies are represented on the group. It is intended to set up a specific group of representatives to consider the various issues affecting staff interests.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Ruchill Hospital, Glasgow

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on recent shortages of accommodation at the infectious diseases unit of Ruchill hospital, Glasgow.

Mr. John MacKay: The Greater Glasgow health board is reviewing its proposal to close a ward in the infectious diseases unit at Ruchill hospital in the light of further studies which it has carried out. Mr. John MacKay: Representations were received from

Orkney Fishermen's Association
Salmon Net Fishing Association of Scotland
Association of Scottish District Salmon Fishery Boards
Western Isles Fishermen's Association
Western Isles Council

(b) The National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations
The Northumberland Sea Fisheries Committee

The Commission of the European Community was consulted and indicated that the order was compatible with Community law and in conformity with the common fisheries policy.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the Inshore Fishing (Prohibition of Carriage of Monofilament Gill Nets) (Scotland) Order 1986 applies to European Economic Community vessels.

Mr. John MacKay: From 31 March 1986 it will be an offence for any British fishing vessel to have monofilament nets on board in Scottish inshore waters. Any person found guilty of that offence shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £5,000, or on conviction on indictment to an unlimited fine. The court may also order the forfeiture of any net or other fishing gear used in the commission of the offence.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what actions will be taken under the Inshore Fishing (Prohibition of Monofilament Gill Nets) (Scotland) Order 1986 against English fishing vessels fishing in the Pope Bank for cod with monofilament nets and landing their catches in Scottish ports.

Mr. John MacKay: The Inshore Fishing (Prohibition of Carriage of Monofilament Gill Nets) (Scotland) Order 1986 was made under section 2 of the Inshore Fishing (Scotland) Act 1984 which gives my right hon. and learned Friend power to prohibit by order the carriage, for any purpose, in any British fishing boat, in any specified sea area within Scottish inshore waters, of a type of net specified in the order. The order does not apply to vessels of other countries within the European Economic Community.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Primary Health Care

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when his Department first announced plans for the Green Paper on primary health care; and why it has not been published to date.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Government announced their intention to publish a Green Paper in April 1984. Since then there has been a number of important developments which the Government wished to take into account including the publication of the Royal College of General Practitioners' policy statement "Quality in General Practice".

Teeth (Fillings)

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the cost to the National Health Service of fillings to teeth carried out by the dental service for the most recent 12 month period for which figures are available; and what was the real cost for the same period 10 years previously;

(2) what was the total number of gold crowns authorised for fitting to National Health Service patients during the most recent 12 month period for which figures are available; what was the average cost of supplying gold crowns; and what was the charge made to non-exempt patients.

Mr. Hayhoe: The cost of fillings carried out in the general dental service in England in 1984 was £152·1 million. The cost in 1974 was £158·6 million at 1984 prices.

In 1984, 632,000 gold crowns were provided under the general dental service in England. The average cost of these crowns (excluding the cost of any cores, posts, pins or screws) was £69·30. Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Stockport Health Authority (Management)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many posts at district level in the Stockport district health authority's new management structure will be held by people with a nursing qualification; and how many in the management structure of the proposed acute and maternity unit will have nursing qualifications;

(2) if he will set out the top 10 management posts in the Stockport district health authority, with salaries, before the Griffiths re-organisation, and the top 10 posts after, with salaries; and if he will indicate which of the people in post before re-organisation obtained jobs in the re-organised structure; how many of the new posts were advertised and filled by competition; and how many were not.

Mr. Hayhoe: A professionally qualified chief nursing officer is a full member of Stockport health authority's district management board. I regret, however, that all the detailed information necessary to answer the rest of the hon. Member's points is not held centrally. Mr. Whitney: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information he seeks as it is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of the Wandsworth district health authority for this information.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when his Department last undertook a review of the finishing age for eligibility for mobility allowance; and if he will not lift this upper limit to 80 years.

Mr. Newton: The last change in the age limits was in November 1979. We keep the position under review but have no present plans for any change.

Mr. Hayhoe: I intend to make an announcement soon.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate he has of the effect on employment in the pharmaceutical industry of the introduction of the selected list of drugs.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is impossible to identify accurately the effect on employment of a particular change of policy. But Department of employment statistics on the pharmaceutical industry as a whole show that over the period December 1984 to December 1985 the number employed rose by 500.

Mr. Newton: Ninetyfour single payments in respect of extra fuel used during a period of exceptionally severe weather were made by the Chelsea local office, which covers the whole of Fulham. The total amount paid was £1,158.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what estimate he has made of the costs involved in making severe weather payments;

(2) what steps are being taken to publicise the availability of severe weather payments;

(3) what is the estimate of the costs to be incurred in publicising the availability of severe weather payments.

Mr. Newton: It is not possible to make a reliable estimate of the likely administrative and benefit costs of making single payments for extra fuel used during the recent period of exceptionally severe weather.

Paragraphs 7448 to 7450 of the S manual, a copy of which is in the Library, cover the publicity arrangements to be followed when a period of exceptionally severe weather has been declared. In addition, Ministers and regional information officers have made many broadcasts on national and local radio and television on this subject, and advertisements have recently appeared in most of the national daily and Sunday papers.

The cost of these national advertisements and of reprinting further supplies of leaflets and posters to ensure adequate stocks, is approximately £270,000.

Oswestry and District Hospital

Mr. Hayhoe: The Department has received the Shropshire health authority's consultation document, papers summarising all the views and objections to the proposals, together with health authority's response, and details of all the bodies and individuals who submitted views. All these papers were considered at public meetings of the Shropshire health authority and the West Midlands regional health authority, and are thus public documents. Figures are based on all employees in Great Britain in full-time employment on adult rates of pay, and on the not-contracted out rates of national insurance contribution applicable in April each year.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each year since 1955-56 the proportion of the national insurance fund contributed by employees, employers and the Exchequer.

(2) what is his policy towards the use by local authorities of publicity campaigns to increase applications for single payments;

(3) if he has evidence of an increase in fraudulent claims for single payments in (a) Southwark and (b) the country as a whole;

Mr. Newton: The table sets out the most recent estimates of average private sector rents the average hall of residence charges produced by the National Union of Students (NUS) and the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principles (CVCP). No information is available about the level of rents paid by students on local authority housing. It should also be noted that hall of residence charges include other items besides rent.

Telephone Directories (Entry Costs)

Mr. Major: The additional cost is estimated to be £80 per annum.

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects genito-urinary treatment to be available, after the proposed closure of the Dreadnought seamen's hospital, in the Greenwich district.

Mr. Whitney: I understand that the genito-urinary clinic presently situated at the Dreadnought seamen's hospital will move to Greenwich district hospital without a break in service.

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what genito-urinary treatment he expects will be available on a continuing basis in the Lewisham and North Southwark district after 1 April.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Dreadnought Seamen's Hospital

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he is satisfied that hospital facilities for seamen will be fully operative until 31 March at the Dreadnought seamen's hospital in Greenwich;

(2) if he is satisfied that the building at St. Thomas's hospital in which it is proposed to house the Dreadnought seamen's hospital is ready for permanent occupation by that hospital.

Mr. Whitney: We are satisfied that the facilities for seamen will be provided at the Dreadnought seamen's hospital until the service is transferred to St. Thomas's hospital in the West Lambeth health authority. I understand that the transfer to permanent accommodation is scheduled to take place on 1 April, although I believe that some external refurbishment will be necessary towards the end of the year, and that the patients will be accommodated in nearby wards while this is carried out.

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied that provision currently being made for geriatric patients referred to the Dreadnought seamen's hospital in Greenwich by the Lewisham and North Southwark health authority will be catered for by that authority after 1 April.

Mr. Whitney: I understand that provision for these patients is presently the subject of discussion between the two health authorities, and I am assured that satisfactory arrangements will be agreed to facilitate continuity of care following closure of the Dreadnought seamen's hospital in Greenwich.

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the contents of the report he has received about the state of the building at St. Thomas's hospital in which it is proposed to house the Dreadnought seamen's hospital.

Mr. Whitney: We have not seen any such report.

St. Nicholas Hospital, Plumstead

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied that alternative provision and support services currently provided by St. Nicholas hospital, Plumstead, will be provided by the Greenwich and Bexley health authorities after the proposed closure of that hospital takes effect.

Mr. Whitney: I have been assured by the South-East Thames regional health authority that there will be continuity of care following this closure and that satisfactory alternative local provision is planned.

Mrs. B. (Invalid Carriage)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what are the current whereabouts of the offside rear shock absorber of the crashed three-wheel carriage driven by Mrs. B. of Rutland, (Department reference PO(5) 4374/61); and why it was removed by representatives of his Department prior to the second visit by Mrs. B.'s consultant engineer to the Ministry's retained garage in December 1983;

(2) what tests were carried out by representatives of his Department on the removed shock absorber of Mrs. B. of Rutland's invalid carriage prior to December 1983; why they were only instigated after the first report in May 1983 by Mrs. B.'s consultant engineer; what was the result of the tests; and what steps were taken to notify Mrs. B.'s legal advisers of the findings;

(3) why no response was made by his Department's artificial limb and appliance centre at Sherwood hospital to the oral and written complaints made by Mrs. B. of Rutland (reference PO(5) 4374/61) about the condition of her three-wheeled invalid carriage in February 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 6 February 1986, c. 214]: I have now written to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 17 February 1986, c. 65]: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member all the information he seeks, but details of membership changes prior to the reorganisation of the National Health Service in 1982 are no longer readily available. The terms of office of half the regional health authority members end every two years. Dental Charges

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, further to the answer of 20 December, Official Report, column 420, he will give the average amount of dental charges remitted on form F1D, in money terms, and the percentage that fell within the following or other convenient ranges of charges: (a) £0-£5·99, (b) £6·00-£9·99, (c) £10·00-£14·99, (d) £15.00-£29·99, (e) £30.00-£49·99 and (f) over £50·00.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to the reply, 5 March 1986, c. 149]: In 1984 the average amount of dental charges remitted in England and Wales where remission was successfully claimed on form F1D was £27. The percentages of successful claims falling within the ranges of which information is available, were as follows:

£	Percentage
0-4·99	1
5-9·99	3
10-14·99	17
15-29·99	2
30-49·99	39
50 and over	38

Pensions and Benefits

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services by how much will each of (a) the single pension, (b) the married pension, (c) unemployment benefit, (d) child benefit and (e) long-term rate of supplementary benefit in 1985-86 and 1986-87 have to rise to keep pace with prices.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 26 February 1986, c. 612]: As my right hon. Friend made clear in his uprating statement to the House on Monday 24 February, at columns 680-81, the value of all the benefits listed will be increased in July 1986 by 1·1 per cent., in line with the increase in prices between May 1985 and January 1986. The benefit uprating in April 1987 will take account of inflation between January and September 1986. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer took the assumption in his autumn statement that price rises over that period would be 2·25 per cent, but the final inflation figure on which the April 1987 uprating will be based will not be know until October 1986.

Child Benefit

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the first-year and full-year cost of increasing child benefit by £1, £3, £5 and £10 per week in 1985-86 and 1986-87 (a) net of the cost of indexation and (b) net of the cost of indexation and savings in other benefits as a direct result of these measures.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 26 February 1986, c. 611]: The estimated cost of increasing child benefit in November 1985 by the amount shown after deducting the cost of increasing the benefit in line with the retail prices index would have been as follows:

Amount of increase	Cost		After allowing for savings on other benefits
	1985-86	1986-87	1985-86	1986-87
	£ million		£ million
£1	110	315	90	250
£3	550	1,575	450	1,250
£5	1,000	2,850	800	2,200
£10	2,100	6,000	1,700	4,700

The estimated costs of increasing child benefit by these amounts in July 1986, after deducting the cost of the proposed increase of 10p, is as follows:

Amount of increase	1986-87	1987-88	1986-87	1987-88
£1	380	560	300	430
£3	1,220	1,800	950	1,400
£5	2,050	3,050	1,600	2,350
£10	4,150	6,150	3,200	4,750

Benefits (Indexation)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social services what are the full-year and first-year costs of indexing each of (a) the single pension, (b) the married pension, (c) unemployment benefit, (d) child benefit and (e) the long-term rate of supplementary benefit in 1985-86 and 1986-87, both including and excluding savings on other benefits as a direct result of indexation of these benefits.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 26 February 1986, c. 611]: The estimated costs of increasing social security benefits in November 1985 in line wih the retail prices index are as follows:

Benefit	Cost		After allowing for savings on other benefits
	1985-86	1986-87	1985-86	1986-87
				£ million
Retirement pension—men & women on own insurance	325	940	255	745
Retirement pension—married women on husband's insurance & adult dependants	55	150	40	120
Unemployment benefit	40	115	25	75
Child benefit	110	315	85	250
Supplementary allowance—long term rate	40	140	*25	*65
Supplementary pension	60	160	†−5	†−20

* Net costs after allowing for the uprating of other benefits.
† Net savings after allowing for the uprating of retirement pension.

The estimated costs of increasing these benefits in July 1986 in line with the retail prices index are as follows:

Benefits	Cost		After allowing for savings on other benefits
	1986-87	1987-88	1986-87	1987-88
				£ million
Retirement pension—men & women on own insurance	105	155	80	120
Retirement pension—married women on husband's insurance & adult dependants	20	25	15	20
Unemployment benefit	10	15	5	10
Child benefit	45	65	35	50
Supplementary allowance—long term rate	15	25	*15	*20
Supplementary pension	25	35	*3	*5

* Net costs after allowing for the uprating of other benefits.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the first-year and full-year cost of increasing unemployment benefit by £1 and £5 per week in 1985-86 and 1986-87 (a) net of the cost of indexation and (b) net of the cost of indexation and savings in other benefits as a direct result of these measures.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 26 February 1986, c. 611]: The estimated costs of increasing unemployment benefit in November 1985 by the amount shown, after deducting the cost of increasing the benefit in line with the retail prices index, would have been as follows:

Amount of increase	Cost/Saving		After allowing for savings on other benefits
	1985-86	1986-87	1985-86	1986-87
				£ million
£1	(−20)	(−50)	(−15)	(−35)
£5	50	150	35	100

The actual increase in the standard rate of unemployment benefit for a single person due to indexation was £2, so that an increase of £1 would have produced a saving.

The estimated costs of increasing unemployment benefit by these amounts in July 1986, after deducting the cost of the proposed increase of 35p in the standard rate of unemployment benefit for a single person, is as follows:

Amount of increase	Cost		After allowing for savings on other benefits
	1986-87	1987-88	1986-87	1987-88
				£ million
£1	20	30	15	20
£5	140	200	100	150

Maternity Services

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many district health authorities provide maternity services from (a) more than one site and (b) only one site.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 27 February 1986, c. 684]: I am sorry that I cannot give the hon. Member the information she seeks in precisely the form requested. Of the 191 district health authorities providing hospital maternity services in 1984, the latest year for which information is available centrally, 91 provided in-patient facilities in more than one separately administered unit and 100 in one separately administered unit.

Medicines

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will undertake an inquiry into the illegal import of medicines, including the extent to which such medicines are unlicensed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 28 February 1986, c. 716]: My Department is already making inquiries and investigations in all cases where there is evidence, from any source, that medicinal products, which have been imported, are being sold or supplied in contravention of the Medicines Act and European Community pharmaceutical directives. As a result of these investigations, enforcement, including, where appropriate, prosecution, is being pursued where there is sufficient evidence to warrant this.

In order to aid enforcement, a list of medicinal products which have been granted United Kingdom product licences (parallel importing) has recently been issued to representative organisations, for general use by their members. This list shows the EC member states in which the product is licensed, since it is only from these countries that the product may be imported. This list is at present updated monthly.

If my hon. Friend has any information on unlicensed medicines on sale or supply in the United Kingdom I should be grateful if he would send it to me so that my Department can look into it.

Pensions

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would the single pension and married pension be if they had kept pace with the rise in average earnings since 1979; how this compares with the actual level of pensions in 1985-86 and 1986-87; and what would be the first-year and full-year costs of an increase in pension so as to restore the link with earnings (a) net of the cost of indexation and (b) net of the cost of indexation and savings on other benefits as a direct result of restoration of earnings/pension link.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 26 February 1986, c. 605]: Had retirement pension been increased in line with the rise in average earnings since November 1978, the rates for single and married pensioners that would have come into effect in November 1985, based on the movement of earnings to May 1985, would have been as follows:

November 1985

	Single £	Married £
Actual benefit rates	38·30	61·30
Rates if link to earnings retained	39·65	63·45

The cost of the extra increase would have been £200 million in 1985-86 and £575 million in a full year. The cost after allowing for savings on other benefits would have been £150 million in 1985-86 and £450 million in a full year.

The July 1986 uprating will be based on the movement of prices to January 1986. Corresponding figures for the movement of earnings over this period are not yet available.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the first-year and full-year cost of increases in the single and married pensions in 1985-86 and 1986-87 by £1, £5, £8 and 10 per week (a) inclusive of the cost of indexation, (b) net of the cost of indexation and (c) net of the cost of indexation and savings in other benefit payments as a direct result of these pension increases.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 26 February 1986, c. 605]: The estimated costs of increasing retirement pension in November 1985 by the amounts shown would have been as follows:

(a) inclusive of the cost of increasing retirement pension in line with the retail prices index;
(b) after deducting the cost of the increase in line with the retail prices index;
(c) after deducting the cost of the increase in line with the retail prices index, and also allowing for savings on other benefits.

Amount of increase*	(a) 1985-86	1986-87	(b) 1985-86	1986-87	(c) 1985-86	1986-87
£1	170	480	†−200	†−600	†−150	†−450
£5	850	2,400	450	1,300	300	900

£10	1,700	4,800	1,300	3,700	900	2,600

* The increase is assumed to apply both to the personal rate of retirement pension and to the rate for adult dependants and married women dependent on their husband's insurance.

† The cost of a £1 increase is less than the cost of increasing retirement pension in line with the retail prices index.

The estimated costs of increasing retirement pension by these amounts in July 1986 are as follows:

£ million

Amount of increase*	(a) 1986-87	1987-88	(b) 1986-87	1987-88	(c) 1986-87	1987-88

£10	3,200	4,800	3,100	4,600	2,300	3,400

* The increase is assumed to apply both to the personal rate of retirement pension and to the rate for adult dependants and married women dependent on their husband's insurance.

Commercial Woodlands (Tax Relief)

Mr. John asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the tax revenue forgone resulting from the availability of relief under (a) schedule B and (b) schedule D for owners of commercial woodlands.

Mr. Moore: Expenses of planting, maintenance and upkeep of woodlands are allowable for tax purposes under schedule D, and the estimated revenue forgone in relation to these expenses is tentatively estimated at some £10 million in 1985-86.

No expenses are allowable for tax purposes under schedule B.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the proportion of Government revenue raised by (a) direct and (b) indirect taxes for each of the past 20 years.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion social security contributions have made to total Government revenue for each year since 1955-56; and if he will also divide this data according to the contributions made by (a) employees and (b) employers.

Mr. MacGregor: The proportion of social security contributions to total Government revenue since 1955-56 is as follows:

Tax Threshold

Mr. Frank Field asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if, expressing the tax threshold as 100 in 1955-56, he will measure the increase in the threshold at the latest available date for a single person, married couple and a married couple with two and four children;

(2) if he will express for each year since 1955-56 the tax threshold as a percentage of average earnings for a single person, married couple, married couple with two children and married couple with four children.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Income Tax

Mr. Frank Field asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will calculate the total amount of income tax reductions in money terms since 1979; and if he will present the distribution of this total among the (a) top one per cent. of income earnings, (b) top 2 to 5 per cent. of income earnings, (c) top 6 to 10 per cent. of income earnings, (d) top 11 to 20 per cent. of income earnings, (e) top 21 to 30 per cent. of income earnings, *(f)*top 31 to 40 per cent. of income earnings, (g) top 41 to 50 per cent. of income earnings and (h) bottom 50 per cent.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Systime plc

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the United States Government made representations to him seeking the initiation of legal action against Systime plc by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in 1983 or 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: In 1983-84, United Kingdom Customs undertook inquiries into the activities of Systime plc. No legal action was taken against the company following those inquiries. As is the rule with other investigating agencies, it is not the practice of customs to disclose the source of information, if any, in any investigation.

Freeports

Mr. Hill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will direct Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to appoint an official with sole responsibility for liaison with freeports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

PRIME MINISTER

Disabled Persons (Services, Representations and Consultations) Bill

Q13. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister what response she has given to representations made to her concerning the Government's attitude towards the Disabled Persons (Services, Representations and Consultation) Bill; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have so far received only one letter about the Government's attitude towards the Bill from the hon. Member, and I have already responded.

As my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health has made clear, the Government would like to see a measure emerge which genuinely helps to improve services for disabled people without imposing impracticable and inflexible burdens on local authorities, distorting priorities and diverting scarce resources.

Westland plc

Q153. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister what action Mr. Charles Powell understood her to have taken after receipt of the letter from the Solicitor-General to the then Secretary of State for Defence on 6 January; and what basis he had for this understanding.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to the account which I gave to the House in my statement on 23 January, at columns 449-60, and in the debate on 27 January, at columns 651-58.

Northern Ireland

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Prime Minister whether United States or other foreign aid for Northern Ireland will be accepted by Her Majesty's Government if it is made conditional on external supervision or intervention in matters within the internal jurisdiction of the United Kingdom.

The Prime Minister: The Government have welcomed the possibility of United States aid for Northern Ireland. Although there are now Bills before the United States Congress, no arrangements or definite proposals have yet been put to us.

Lord Chancellor

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Prime Minister if, following his refusal to divest himself of his interest as a name at Lloyd's before the Financial Services Bill reaches the House of Lords for consideration, she will dismiss the Lord Chancellor.

The Prime Minister: No.

WALES

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what initiatives he proposes taking to help integrate people suffering from mental illness within the community; whether any necessary resources for such a strategy will be over and above those already allocated for the all-Wales strategy for mentally handicapped people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The Department is now reviewing the progress made so far in implementing the mental handicap strategy and is, at the same time, considering whether any additional steps should now be taken with regard to mental illness services.

Perinatal Deaths

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what information he has on research findings asserting a correlation between the incidence of perinatal deaths and the rate of attendances for antenatal care after 19 weeks; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what information he has on research findings asserting a correlation between the incidence of perinatal deaths and certain methods of foetal monitorings; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what information he has on research findings asseting a correlation between perinatal deaths and ultra-sound examination; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what information he has on research findings asserting a correlation between the incidence of perinatal deaths and the status of persons delivering babies;

(5) what information he has on research asserting a correlation between impaired foetal development, high perinatal mortality and the nutritional value of a mother's diet; and if he will make a statement;

(6) what information he has on research asserting a correlation between the incidence of perinatal death and the unemployment history of partners or parents; and if he will make a statement;

(7) what information he has on research findings asserting a correlation between the incidence of perinatal death and the social class of parents; and if he will make a statement;

(8) what information he has on research findings asserting a correlation between the incidence of perinatal death and the use of X-ray examinations; and if he will make a statement;

(9) what information he has on research findings asserting a correlation between the incidence of perinatal death and the time between intramuscular analgesia and delivery; and if he will make a statement;

(10) what information he has on research findings asserting a correlation between the incidence of perinatal deaths and the status of persons attempting to resuscitate babies; and if he will make a statement;

(11) what information he has on research findings asserting a correlation between the incidence of perinatal deaths and the mode of delivery; and if he will make a statement;

(12) what information he has on research findings asserting a correlation between the incidence of perinatal deaths and breech presentation before 37 weeks; and if he will make a statement;

(13) what information he has on research findings asserting a correlation between the incidence of perinatal deaths and the nature of presentation at delivery; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I am aware that a number of studies and reports have been published on perinatal mortality and the factors listed in the hon. Gentleman's questions. However, a summary of the findings of these could only be provided at disproportionate cost. The perinatal mortality survey group set up by my right hon. Friend to identify the significant causes of perinatal mortality in Wales will be giving consideration to relevant research in this field in presenting its report later this year.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report for each of the last five years for each health authority, the perinatal standardised mortality ratio.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The Welsh Office does not produce estimates of perinatal standardised mortality ratios.

Birth Statistics

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the information that is available to him, by health authority in Wales, of the number of babies delivered at home in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The numbers of births in the years 1980 to 1984 which were registered as having occurred at the mother's usual place of residence are given in the table:

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report for each of the last five years, for each health authority in Wales, the percentage of all babies born who had a low birthweight, under 2,501 grams.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is given in the table:

Health Authorities (Minutes of Meetings)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the information known to him as to those health authorities in Wales which send minutes of their meetings to right hon. and hon. Members.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I understand that the Gwynedd health authority regularly circulates its minutes to the respective Members of Parliament, but that it is not the normal practice of the other district health authorities in Wales to do so.

Bereavement Counselling Service

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information is available to him as to which health authorities in Wales operate a bereavement counselling service for mothers.

Mr. Mark Robinson: This information is not kept centrally.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Burnham Teachers Panel

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he next plans to review the allocation of seats on the Burnham teachers panel; and if he will institute a system of regular reviews to ensure that the panel accurately reflects changes in the membership of the teachers organisations.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have only recently completed a review of the teachers' panel of the Burnham primary and secondary committee and I shall continue to keep the changes in membership of the teacher unions under careful observation.

European Studies (Great Britain and Ireland)

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the project known as European Studies (Great Britain and Ireland) and promoted by his Department together with the Departments of Education in Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic.

Mr. Chris Patten: This curriculum development project, the planning of which began in early 1984, is to be organised and funded jointly by the Department of Education for Northern Ireland, the Department of Education, Dublin, and the Department of Education and Science, London. It will extend their long-standing co-operation in the educational field.

The project, which will begin in the school year 1986-87 will involve six secondary schools in Northern Ireland, six in the Republic of Ireland and six in Great Britain, and will attempt to encourage pupils in the United Kingdom and Ireland to explore both the common elements and the rich diversity of their heritage. History and geography will be the main subjects involved and pupil skills in these subjects will be developed by way of individual and group research as well as project work. The project will also concentrate on the acquisition of new skills and techniques in the area of information technology.

Pupil-Teacher Ratios and Class Sizes

Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what information he has on the average pupil-teacher ratio in primary and secondary schools in other advanced industrial countries including the United States of America, Japan, West Germany, France, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics;

(2) what information he has about the average class size in primary and secondary schools in other advanced industrial countries, including the United States of America, Japan, West Germany, France and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Dunn: The available information is shown in the following table but it is not possible to provide data on a strictly comparable basis for each country. Data are mainly based on full-time equivalent teachers numbers except where stated. The precise definition of "teacher" can vary between countries and may include staff not engaged in teaching. Reference is made to further differences in the footnotes to the table. Average class size data for up to first level are included in the table. Class size information for second level education is not available.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Value Added and Data Services

Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to take decisions on the future licensing régime for value added and data services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: As its next major step in its programme for the liberalisation of telecommunication services in the United Kingdom, the Government have decided further to open up competition in value added and data network services.

The Government's proposals, set out in a consultative document issued in December 1985, follow extensive earlier consultation, and have been generally welcomed by the public telecommunication operators, the industry and users. A copy of the consultative document has already been placed in the Library of the House. The Government now intend to use these proposals as the basis for a single class licence of 12 years duration to be issued by my right hon. Friend under the Telecommunications Act 1984.

The single class licence will be applicable to all but public telecommunication operators, members of their groups and associates. The licence will authorise the provision of all value added network services and all basic conveyance services except basic conveyance voice and telex services. Basic conveyance voice services will, however, be permitted as part of a directory information service. They will also be permitted when in necessary support of a value added service or as an integral part of a single more comprehensive service such as video conferencing; though in these latter cases the provision of voice services will be subject to a tariff condition.

Authorised services will, as at present, have to be conveyed between premises by means of fixed links provided by the PTOs. Simple resale as defined in the PTOs' own licences will also continue to be prohibited.

The Government believe that the provisions in the new licence applicable to small value added network service providers should be kept as simple as possible. Such providers, those below a certain financial threshold, will be authorised to operate their services subject only to a privacy and safety condition and to standard conditions for the running and maintenance of telecommunication systems to be set out in the licence.

For those value added service providers considered capable of distorting competition in the value added services market and for all basic conveyance service providers, additional licence conditions will apply to ensure that fair trading obligations and the provision of services to open system interconnection standards can be met. After considering the comments received in the consultation process the Government intend that these obligations should apply to those value added network service providers whose annual telecommunications business turnover exceeds £1 million or who belong to a group with a total annual turnover in excess of £50 million. The Director General of Telecommunications will, however, be given the power to vary this figure in the light of experience. Basic conveyance service providers too will be subject to these conditions though the possibility of allowing certain market entry exemptions is under consideration.

The specific licence conditions to apply to the value added and basic conveyance service providers identified above will include

(i) an obligation to provide separate accounts for and not to cross-subsidise unfairly their basic conveyance service activities; their value added service activities; and other activities;

(ii) an obligation to operate under standard fair competition conditions of a kind already included in the PTO licences, that is publication of tariffs; prohibition on undue preference and undue discrimination; prohibition of linked sales; prohibition on exclusive dealing arrangements; and code of practice on the confidentiality of customer information;

(iii) an obligation, in time, to provide OSI facilities;

(iv) an obligation in the context of the provision of OSI or parallel proprietary facilities to give the Director General of Telecommunications and the public advance notice of material changes to their systems and services; and

(v) an obligation to register with the Office of Telecommunications to ensure the effective monitoring of their licence obligations;

though the precise obligations will not be finalised until the outcome of negotiations between the Director General of Telecommunications and the PTOs to amend the main PTO licences in an appropriate manner are known.

The Government have been persuaded from consultation with industry and users that in the light of the above safeguards the creation of a separate licensed category of monopoly apparatus or software supplier would not contribute further to fair competition but would add significantly to the complexity of the regulatory environment. The Government therefore do not intend to introduce these further categories of licence holder.

The Government are committed to promote the adoption of open system interconnection standards. The licence will permit the continued use of proprietary standards; but in order to widen the choice of equipment and service available to users and to increase opportunities for equipment manufacturers, the licence will impose a requirement to provide for access and use of both new and existing services by means of OSI standards. In-house systems will be exempt as will services for which the Director General is satisfied that there is no existing or potential user demand for OSI access. The licence will provide for a 12-month notification period to service providers of the obligation to provide access to individual OSI standards. The Director General will have the power to extend the notification period in exceptional circumstances. Licensees will need to be able to demonstrate how their services conform to OSI standards and, where access by proprietary standards is provided in addition to OSI, that the OSI access provides a broadly comparable service in terms of performance and price.

The provision of value added network services can often be associated with the need to transmit occasional basic conveyance messages allied to the value added service. The Government therefore intend to permit those small value added network service operators to whom the fair trading and OSI obligations would not otherwise apply to provide a small percentage of basic conveyance services, associated with value added services, without this provision of basic conveyance services triggering the requirement to meet those fair trading and open system interconnection conditions contained in the licence.

The licence will also extend the already permitted uses of international private leased circuits, for the provision of the services being opened to competition, to the extent consistent with the Government's international obligations.

The Government have considered certain representations that access for overseas service providers should be made available only on the basis of reciprocity. The Government will continue to press for the widest possible multilateral liberalisation of international telecommunications, but do not believe that it would be right to deprive telecommunications users of the benefits of a wide choice of services simply because of different conditions applied by other Administrations in overseas markets.

BT and Mercury have already agreed in principle to the modification, by the Director General of Telecommunications, of their existing licences, so as to prohibit their unfair cross-subsidy by appropriate separate accounting as well as to require the provision of OSI facilities; so that in the areas newly opened up to competition they will be offering their services on an equitable competitive basis with other service providers in this market. The Director General of Telecommunications will be pursuing this further with them in the months ahead. In the same period my Department will be circulating for comment a full draft of the proposed licence to ensure that in technical and legal terms it fulfils the aims set out in this statement. The aim is to have the full licence in place before 6 August 1986, the date when the validity of the existing 1982 VANS general licence under the transitional provisions of the Telecommunications Act 1984 comes to an end.

The Government believe that these new proposals taken together will provide a regulatory environment in which users can benefit from the latest technology through the provision on a competitive basis of significant facilities which are not yet normally available from PTOs without having as their main effect the diversion of PTO traffic revenues. All services which are legitimately permitted under the existing 1982 VANS general licence will of course remain liberalised. The further liberalisation which the new licence will initiate should allow British Telecom, Mercury and the other companies in this rapidly expanding industry the opportunity, while competing fairly to satisfy the increasing demands for new services, both to the service providers' benefit and to the benefit of users of telecommunications services.

Computer Modems (West Midlands)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of the 12,000 computer modems for schools will be distributed among schools in the west midlands.

Mr. Pattie: The intention of the modems in schools scheme is to provide each middle and secondary school in the United Kingdom with one modem. On this basis the proportion distributed to the west midlands will be 4 per cent.

Airbus

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Eccles on 21 February, Official Report, column 359, he will reconsider his reply about the percentage of the British aerospace industry's contribution to the A320 Airbus; if he will express this contribution in total terms; if he will break the percentages down into engine, airframe, avionics, and other components; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: The reply to the hon. Member on 21 February, at column 359, set out in percentage terms, based on the figures currently available, the contribution in total terms of the British aerospace industry to the Airbus A320 series production. On the latest information available, the contribution of the British aerospace industry to the series production of the main constituent elements of the A320 will be in the order of:

	Per cent.

National Metrological Co-ordinating Unit

Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to publish the annual report of the national metrological co-ordinating unit as required by section 60(1) of the Weights and Measures Act 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The report covering the period 1 April 1984 to 31 March 1985 has been published today. I have arranged for copies of the report, which includes the audited statement of accounts, to be placed in the Library.

Matthew Brown plc

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has received a report from the investigator who inquired into the alleged leak of information about the recommendations of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in regard to the bid by Scottish and Newcastle Breweries plc for Matthew Brown plc; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The investigator appointed to inquire into this alleged leak has now reported after a thorough and painstaking inquiry. No proof has emerged of a deliberate leak having occurred, although the investigator could not rule out the possibility that some information about the Monopolies and Mergers Commission findings may have leaked. He concluded, however, that if this were the case, any such leak was likely to have resulted from indiscretion or accident rather than intentioned revelation. He has not been able to identify a source. He found that the letter written by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to a member of the public on 8 October was not responsible for stock market movements or the article in The Times and had no bearing on the main events of the case.

Fireworks (Injuries)

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the figures for injuries caused by fireworks in 1985.

Mr. Howard: According to reports from hospitals in England, Wales and Scotland, 968 people required treatment for injuries caused by fireworks during a four-week period in October and November 1985. The figures for 1985 and the preceding four years are as follows:

Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd.

Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, further to his statement in the House on 7 March, he will state what was the further term in the other bid for Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd. which he found very difficult to accept.

Mr. Channon: The term, which I can now reveal, required British Shipbuilders to repay with interest virtually the whole of the sum offered for VSEL

"in the event that neither of the following events has occurred:

(a) a binding agreement for the Trident vessel being in place by 25 February 1987

(b) the agreed formal contract documents for the Trident vessel having been issued by MOD by 25 February 1988".

Although the bidder made clear that it

"would procure that VSEL would negotiate in good faith with the MOD and would use its best endeavours to conclude a contract with MOD as quickly as possible", and also undertook that if it was successful it would

"procure that VSEL negotiates with the MOD a contract for the SSBN05 on the basis of terms and conditions, price and programme no less favourable than the conditions of which we have been made aware as modified by any undertaking given to you by the VSEL Management Consortium by 5.30 pm on 5 March 1986".

I repeat that I found this clawback term very difficult to accept.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Ealing Vicarage (Rape)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to the progress of police action to seek to apprehend the gang responsible for rape and assault at the Ealing vicarage on 6 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner that investigations into this incident are being taken forward with all urgency and that the police have been greatly assisted in their inquiries by an outstanding response from the public who have come forward with a considerable amount of information which may prove helpful to the investigation. I fully support the Commissioner's operational commitment to tracing the offenders in this case. Rape is an offence which is taken with the utmost seriousness by the police and the Commissioner has recently introduced a number of changes in the force's procedures for handling rape victims which, while recognising the trauma they experience, is designed to improve the sympathetic treatment which they need.

Prisons (Mortality)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners died in prisons in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, respectively, during each of the past five years for which records are available; what ages were the deceased; and how many of such deaths were from natural causes.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested for England and Wales is as follows:

My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Northern Ireland are responsible for the equivalent information in Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Glen Parva Youth Custody Centre

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes have been introduced in screening or in other medical procedures in Glen Parva youth custody centre since October 1984.

Mr. Mellor: None.

Immigration

Mr. Procter asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will indicate whether the answer to the hon. Member for Billericay's question for written answer of 29 November 1985, Official Report, column 694, will include figures produced manually or by computer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The figures contained in the reply I sent to my hon. Friend on 5 March, of which copies have been placed in the Library, were produced from the computer system.

Rape

Mrs Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people convicted of rape or sex offences during the last seven years have won reductions on the length of their sentences resulting from Court of Appeal rulings.

Mr. Mellor: Of the 320 appellants to the Court of Appeal in 1984, against sentence for a sexual offence, 52 had a custodial sentence reduced; the corresponding figures in 1983 were 248 and 41. The numbers who had a custodial sentence reduced include 11 appellants in 1984 and 10 appellants in 1983 who had been convicted of rape. Corresponding information for earlier years could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Information for 1985 is not yet available.

Featherstone Prison

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many assaults on staff, escapes and other discipline offences have occurred each year in Her Majesty's prison Featherstone, near Wolverhampton; and how many prisoners in the same prison have been subject to rule 4 each year.

Mr. Mellor: Featherstone started receiving prisoners in November 1976. The following is the available information up to the end of 1985:

Year	Assaults on staff	Escapes	Disciplinary offences dealt with at Featherstone: Prisoners punished	Disciplinary offences dealt with at Featherstone: Total offences	Rule 43 cases: No. prisoners	Rule 43 cases: No. occasions
1976	Nil	5	6
1977		8	157	291
1978		2	333	438
1979		7	248	476
1980		2	211	381
1981		Nil	200	304
1982		Nil	198	269	37	38
1983	1	Nil	207	330	25	25
1984	Nil	Nil	201	319	15	16
1985	Nil	7	320	480	29	30

The figures for escapes refer to the numbers of prisoners, not the number of incidents. The 1985 figures for disciplinary offences are provisional.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners Her Majesty's prison Featherstone, Wolverhampton, was intended to accommodate; how many are now in the prison; and what was the average annual occupation each year from opening to the present date.

Mr. Mellor: The certified normal accommodation of Her Majesty's prison Featherstone is 510. On 7 March the population was 530. The average annual occupation has been as follows:

	Average Annual Occupation
1976	*8
1977	253
1978	374
1979	476
1980	478
1981	484
1982	511
1983	516
1984-85	519

* Did not open until November.

Local Radio

Mr. Harvey asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the British Broadcasting Corporation and Independent Broadcasting Authority will have any advisory capacity in his allocation of franchises for the new network of local radio stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We are now considering the allocation of experimental community radio licences in the light of proposals from the advisory panel on community radio appointed for this purpose by the then Home Secretary. The membership of the panel includes a member of the Independent Broadcasting Authority and a member of the staff of the BBC, both appointed in an individual capacity on the basis of their knowledge of broadcasting matters; but neither the authority nor the corporation has played or will play any part in the selection process.

Marriage Services (Offences)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have taken place in each of the last three years for offences in relation to marriage services conducted in the United Kingdom in contravention of the Marriage Acts.

Mr. Mellor: Records available to me, which may be incomplete, cover only England and Wales and show three persons proceeded against in 1982 for offences against the Marriage Acts 1949 and 1954, none in 1983 and none in 1984. Corresponding information for 1985 is not yet available.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Medium-range Missiles

55. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's policy towards a zero solution for the elimination of United States of America and Soviet medium-range missiles.

Mr. Renton: A global zero-zero solution remains Alliance policy. President Reagan's recent proposals offer a realistic basis for achieving that aim, consistent with the maintenance of our security at all times. Those proposals have our full support.

Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty

56. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received regarding the difficulties of verification in negotiating a comprehensive test ban treaty.

Mr. Renton: We have received 23 letters on this subject, 12 from the general public and 11 from hon. and right hon. Members.

57. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he plans to seek to introduce a trial test ban in consultation with other nuclear powers.

Mr. Renton: No. We remain committed to seeking progress towards balanced and verifiable arms control agreements which contribute to United Kingdom security, including a comprehensive test ban treaty. Introducing a trial test ban, which would not meet these criteria, would not be in our interests.

Nuclear Materials (Export Ban)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make it his policy in negotiations on the future of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty to press for a ban on the export of fissile nuclear materials between nuclear weapons states for defence purposes.

Mr. Renton: No.

Embassy Staff

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many diplomatic staff stationed in British embassies abroad have had their assignments prematurely terminated or shortened during the last seven years, and in which countries these took place.

Mr. Eggar: British diplomatic staff in several posts abroad have had their appointments prematurely terminated for a variety of reasons during the period in question. These include political grounds, such as the expulsion of 23 diplomats from the Soviet Union over the last seven years, and personal, operational safety and other reasons. No central records are kept of the numbers of staff involved.

EMPLOYMENT

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Wainwright asked the Paymaster General what is the latest estimate of the number of YTS places lost as a result of cutback in Manpower Services Commission funding of mode B placement schemes in (a) England, (b) Yorkshire and Humberside and (c) West Yorkshire; and how many redundancies are involved in each case.

Mr. Trippier: There will be some reductions in mode B1 type provision under two-year YTS, but we intend to meet the needs of young people and the number of premium and ITEC places next year will be substantially higher than the number of filled B1 places this year.

The figures are:—

	England	Yorkshire & Humberside	West Yorkshire
Number of approved mode B1 places at 28 February 1986	55,193	7,072	2,893
Highest level of filled B1 places in 1985-86	43,040	5,297	1,933
Latest estimate of planned premium & ITEC First and Second Year provision, 1986-87	57,907	7,217	2,803

No information is available about how many redundancies may be declared by providers of mode B1 schemes.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the details of the trainee agreement for YTS trainees.

Mr. Trippier: The training agreement will provide trainees with information about their training programme and about the terms and conditions under which they will participate. The scope of this information is currently the subject of discussion between officials of the Manpower Services Commission and interested parties, including the CBI and TUC.

Wider Opportunities Training Scheme

Mr. Thurnham asked the Paymaster General how many unemployed people have taken part in the wider opportunities training scheme since its inception; what percentage of those taking part subsequently found employment and what was the individual cost of providing each job.

Mr. Trippier: The wider opportunities training programme was introduced in April 1985 as one of the Manpower Services Commission's adult training programmes. It built on work preparation, its predecessor under the training opportunities scheme. At January 1986, 41,300 unemployed people were in or had completed training under the WOTP. Follow-up results for the first six months of 1985-86 show that 51 per cent. of trainees had found employment or further training three months after completion of their course, at an estimated cost of £1,337 for each person helped.

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Andew F. Bennett asked the Paymaster General how many staff are employed in the Department of Employment deregulation unit by grade; what is the cost of the unit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The enterprise and deregulation unit employs the following civil service staff.

	Number
Under Secretary (Grade 3)	1
Assistant Secretary (Grade 5)	2
Principal (or equivalent)	6
Higher Executive Officer/ Higher Executive Officer (Development)	5
Executive Officer	1
Clerical Officer	1
Senior Personal Secretary	1
Personal Secretary	3
Specialist Typist	1

The unit is estimated to cost £488,000 in the 1986-87 financial year. The enterprise and deregulation unit is pursuing the Government's policy of reducing the burden of administrative and legislative requirements across all Government Departments and following up the White Paper "Lifting the Burden" (Cmnd. 9571) published in July last year. A second White Paper will be published this summer.

Factory Inspectors

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Paymaster General whether there has been any delay in the appointment of factory inspectors to the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Trippier: Inspectors are appointed to the Health and Safety Executive as quickly as practicable. The time scale depends on the satisfactory completion of inquiries into age, health etc., and on the period of notice a candidate may have to give his existing employer.

Seventeen factory inspectors have recently taken up post and up to 12 more are expected to join the Health and Safety Executive shortly.

Beer, Wines and Spirits

Mr. Parry asked the Paymaster General (1) how many people were employed in the brewing industry in England and Wales in June 1979; and how many at the latest available date;

(2) asked the Paymaster General how many workers were employed in the wines and spirits industry in June 1979; in England and Wales; and how many at the latest available date.

Mr. Trippier: The available information is as follows:

Employees in Employment in Great Britain

Industry	June 1979	December 1985
Brewing, malting, cider and perry	71,500	54,600
Spirit distilling and compounding	29,400	20,400

The Department's statistics do not provide separate figures for England and Wales.

Nuclear Submarine Bases

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Paymaster General whether representatives of the Health and Safety

Executive are empowered to carry out inspections at (a) United Kingdom and (b) United States' nuclear submarine bases on the Clyde.

Mr. Trippier: Representatives of the Health and Safety Executive are authorised to inspect any nuclear submarine bases on the Clyde.

Tobacco Industry

Mr. Parry asked the Paymaster General if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the numbers employed in the tobacco industry for each quarter since 1979.

Mr. Trippier: The figures for the period March 1979 to September 1985, the latest date for which figures are available, are as follows:

Employees in employment in the tobacco industry in Great Britain

	March	June	September	December
1979	31,300	31,300	31,900	31,600
1980	31,600	31,500	31,500	30,900
1981	29,500	30,100	29,900	29,300
1982	29,000	28,500	28,700	28,100
1983	27,700	26,900	26,700	25,900
1984	25,000	22,000	21,500	20,700
1985	20,300	19,600	18,700	n/a

TRANSPORT

Western Isles (Rescue Helicopter)

58. Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will arrange for a helicopter to be based for rescue purposes at one of the airports in the Western Isles.

Mr. Ridley: As I have already informed the House, following the loss of the Bon Ami, I have asked the United Kingdom search and rescue committee to consider helicopter coverage of the seas off the north-west of Scotland.

Lorries (Overloading)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many prosecutions there have been over each of the last three years against lorry owners for allowing their lorries to be driven while being overloaded.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The number of prosecutions taken by the Department of Transport and local authority trading standards departments against goods vehicle operators for overloading offences were as follows:

	Number
1983	7,012
1984	6,352
1985	7,454

The police also prosecute overloading offences.

M1-M25 (Congestion)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of congestion on the M1 motorway, southbound, from a point some miles prior to its junction with the M25 and continuing up to that junction; what steps he proposes to take to improve the slip road from the M1 to M25; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No interchange between the M1 and M25 will exist until junction 6A of the M1 is opened in the autumn as part of the final section of the M25. The congestion on the approach to junction 6 should then be much reduced. We shall in due course consider whether alterations are needed. In the meantime we are erecting signs on the M1 to warn of delays ahead.

Temporary Spare Wheels

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received in favour of the use of temporary spare wheels; and how many he has received against.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Requests have been received over the years from individual motorists and from vehicle manufacturers to provide clearly in our regulations for the use of temporary spare tyres. Views have also been expressed that we should ban their use. We are about to provide an opportunity for all organisations concerned to make representations to us in the context of a proposal for amending regulations which will permit the use of these spare tyres provided the vehicle is not driven at a speed in excess of 50 mph.

Road Accidents

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many road accident have occurred in each of the past 10 years, involving loss of life or serious injuries in which at least one of the drivers involved had under 12 months experience after passing their driving test.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This information is not available because details of drivers' licences are not given in accident reports.

Dangerous Substances

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if trimethylolpropane triacrylate has been (a) approved as a dangerous substance that is permitted for conveyance by road and (b) classified for the purpose of assigning a hazard warning sign on transporting vehicles.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This substance is not regarded as dangerous in transport and vehicles carrying it in tanks are not required to display hazard warning panels.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if binapacryl has been (a) approved as a dangerous substance that is permitted for conveyance by road and (b) classified for the purpose of assigning a hazard warning sign on transporting vehicles.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This substance is a solid substituted nitrophenol pesticide. It is regarded as "toxic" for the purposes of supply and use under the Classification, Packaging and Labelling Regulations 1984 and packages must be marked with a number of appropriate risk and safety phrases. No further labelling is required for transport purposes but tank vehicles carrying the substance in solution should display a full hazard warning panel with the "harmful" diamond and the toxic liquid mixture identification number 2810.

A23 Warninglid-Brighton (Inquiry)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received the report of the inspector for the A23 Warninglid to Brighton public inquiry; and when he expects to be able to announce his decision on the inspector's recommendations.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We are at present considering the inspector's report on the A23 proposals. I hope to be able to announce a decision in the early summer.

Shipping Statistics

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of ships, giving tonnage, which have (a) sunk and (b) requested assistance in each of the following sea areas:; (i) Pentland Firth (ii) Minch, (iii) Little Minch, (iv) Sea of the Hebrides and (v) North Channel since 1980; and of these if he will state how many in each case were crude oil-carrying tankers.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to the reply, 10 March, c. 366]: The records held in my Department show that in the period 1980-85 there were 30 casualties to ships in the areas referred to and a total of nine vessels sank, as follows:

Location	Total Casualties	Total sinkings	Total Tonnage
Pentland Firth	5	2	92
Minch	6	2	44
Little Minch	8	3	106
Sea of the Hebrides	5	1	18
North Channel	6	1	68

None of the vessels which sank was a crude oil-carrying tanker.

The information on ships requesting assistance is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, the following table lists the number of ships recorded by Her Majesty's Coastguard, actually requiring assistance in the coastguard regions mentioned.

Coast guard SAR areas	1982		1983		1984		1985

East London River Crossing

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made on plans for a new east London river crossing.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to the reply, 10 March, c. 366-367]: Plans for a new east London river crossing were published in 1984 and 1985. These plans are currently the subject of public local inquiries, which started last September.

ENERGY

Alternative Energy Sources

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what investigations into alternative sources of energy are being conducted in Wales; what progress these are making; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will set out the present studies into alternative sources of energy, the amount of Government funding of each one and the manner of progress of each one; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will increase Government funding of research into alternative sources of energy.

Mr. David Hunt: A detailed account of the alternative energy technologies we are examining as part of our research and development programme, details of individual projects, their progress and the prospects for their exploitation in the United Kingdom is given in ETSU R28, R30 and N3/85. Copies of the first two reports are already in the Libraries of the House. I am placing copies of the third report, a register of research and development projects in the Libraries of the House today.

Total expenditure by my Department is currently running at an average of about £14 million per annum. Actual expenditure on the individual technologies from 1975-76 to 1984-85 was as follows:

£ million

	1975-76	1976-77	1977-78	1978-79	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85

* Includes energy conservation research and development.
No information available for 1974-75.

The Government have identified the most promising alternative energy technologies, and increased support is being given to their research and development.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Central America

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom aid programme to central America.

Mr. Raison: British aid to the six countries of central America (excluding Belize) in 1984, the latest year for which figures are available, amounted to £5·38 million. This included loans worth £4·47 million. In addition, we support small development projects co-financed with British voluntary agencies and, in the last two years, have contributed over £1·25 million to international relief organisations to help refugees and displaced persons in central America.

SCOTLAND

Wines, Spirits, Beer and Tobacco

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many workers were employed in the wines and spirits industry in Scotland in June 1979; and how many at the latest available date;

(2) how many workers were employed in the tobacco industry in Scotland in June 1979; and how many at the latest available date;

(3) how many workers were employed in the brewing industry in Scotland at June 1979; and how many at the latest available date.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The only available information is derived from the annual census of production: the estimated average number of workers employed in Scotland during the year is shown in the table.

	1979	1983
Spirit distilling and compounding; wines, cider and perry	23,600	16,700
Brewing and malting	4,500	3,000

Figures for employment in the tobacco industry cannot be published owing to the risk of disclosing information about individual enterprises.

Cancer (Dunoon)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information or statistics he has as to the levels of leukaemia and other cancers in the Dunoon area compared with average figures for the United Kingdom.

Mr. John MacKay: It is not possible to provide United Kingdom comparisons readily, as cancer statistics are collected separately in Scotland and England.

Information immediately available about the incidence of leukaemia and other cancers in the Dunoon area relates only to cases occurring in the 0 to 24 year age group of the population. Statistical information about leukamia in respect of the age group is currently being validated and updated.

The following table shows the actual and expected numbers of registrations of both leukaemia and all cancers except leukaemia in the Dunoon area and in Scotland as a whole.

	Dunoon, Kilmun Inverchaolain Kilmodan	Scotland	Dunoon (Postal District PA23)	Scotland

*Because of local Government reorganisation the area covered from 1975 onwards is slightly different from before that date.

DEFENCE

Nimrod

5. Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a further statement on the Nimrod programme.

21. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he will take to seek to ensure the successful final development of the British Nimrod advanced early warning project and its bringing into service with the Royal Air Force.

45. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has reached a decision on the future of the Nimrod advanced early warning programme.

Mr. Norman Lamont: There is nothing I can add to the full account I gave to the House during our debate on the Royal Air Force on 26 February, at columns 962-65.

Trident

16. Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to conclude the contracts for the Trident submarine.

Mr. Norman Lamont: It is hoped to conclude shortly with the new owners of VSEL the contract for the first Trident submarine.

44. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of that portion of the Trident contract which will be made in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Approximately 55 per cent., or some £5,400 million by value, of the total estimated cost of Trident (£9,869 million at 1985-86 prices and at £1=$1·28) is planned to be spent in the United Kingdom.

54. Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the latest estimates of the cost of the Trident programme; and what proportion is of British manufacture.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer to the answers which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave to the hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) and which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) earlier today.

RAF Trainer Aircraft

17. Mr. Randall asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the slippage in the trainer replacement programme for the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Norman Lamont: As I told the House in opening the debate on the Royal Air Force on 26 February, at column 962, there will be a few months' delay in the delivery of the first aircraft, but it is hoped to recover some of the slippage later in the delivery programme. The first aircraft is expected to be delivered in early 1987 and the first twelve by the end of 1987.

Saudi Arabia (Aerospace Contract)

19. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the expected total value of the recently signed aerospace contract with Saudi Arabia.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The memorandum of understanding signed on 17 February 1986 covers the provision of aircraft, associated equipment, initial spares, training and technical support to a value in the order of £5 billion.

Defence Programme (Costings)

20. Mr. Woodall asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress he has made on the long-term costings of the defence programme.

Mr. Younger: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier to the hon. Members for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Lamond) and for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay).

30. Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what weapons system he expects to cancel or postpone as a result of his long-term costing of the defence programme.

Mr. Stanley: I cannot anticipate the outcome of my right hon. Friend's consideration of the long-term costing.

RIMPAC Naval Exercise

22. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the United Kingdom will be taking part in naval exercises in the Pacific later in the current year; and what other countries are involved in these exercises.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 4 February, at column 122.

Western Europe (Missile Defence System)

23. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has commissioned any research on the feasibility of a ballistic missile defence system for western Europe; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: No, although NATO's requirements for air defence are kept under constant review.

King Vessels

24. Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will now place an order with British Shipbuilders for the fleet support King vessels.

Mr. Lee: We have studied this design with interest, but the Royal Navy does not at present have a requirement for a vessel of this type.

Recruitment

25. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the quality and quantity of recruits for the armed forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: I am generally satisfied both with the numbers, and quality, of those offering themselves for service. The vast majority of those selected achieve standards above the minimum set for entry.

Falkland Islands

26. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the latest estimates of all costs of defending the Falklands for 1986-87 and 1987-88, respectively.

Mr. Stanley: Our latest estimates of costs is in line with the provision of £442 million and £292 million, respectively, which was announced in "The Government's Expenditure Plans for 1986-87 to 1988-89" (Cmnd. 9702–II).

Reservists (Military Training)

27. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has as to which West European armies have a requirement for regular reservists to undertake a period of military training in excess of one day each year or biannually.

Mr. Lee: Levels of reservists training in other west European countries are not readily comparable with the standard suggested by my hon. Friend.

European Fighter Programme

28. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the European fighter programme.

Mr. Norman Lamont: As I told the House during the debate on the Royal Air Force on 26 February, at columns 958-60, work on the European fighter aircraft project is proceeding well, and there is much work to be done in the coming months before the industrial report on project definition is submitted to the four Governments for appraisal later this year.

Youth Training

29. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the participation of Her Majesty's forces in the revised YTS scheme.

Mr. Lee: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave on the armed services YTS on 11 February 1986, at column 444.

Turkish Prime Minister

31. Mr. Bill Walker asked the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he makes of the prospect of selling Tornados to Turkey in the light of the Turkish Prime Minister's recent visit to Britain.

Mr. Norman Lamont: It is not our policy to comment on individual sales prospects.

Defence Sales

32. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Defence how the current level of defence sales compares with a year ago.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Complete figures for contracts signed in 1985 are not yet available, but are expected to show a significant increase over the previous year.

British Payload Specialist

33. Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, following the American shuttle accident, there will be any delay in the launch of the British payload specialist.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The planned launches of two Skynet 4 communications satellites, which are due to be assisted by British payload specialists, will be delayed as a result of the shuttle accident, but the extent of the delays has yet to be finally determined.

Tornado Aircraft

34. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress is being made in selling Tornado aircraft to United Kingdom North Atlantic Treaty Organisation partners.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Panavia and the individual Tornado partners continue to pursue actively not only NATO but also world markets for Tornado aircraft. To date 80 Tornados have been sold, 72 to Saudi Arabia and eight to Oman, and potential sales are currently being promoted both in Europe and elsewhere.

Strategic Defence Initiative

35. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations he has had concerning a battle management system for the strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The arrangements between the United States and United Kingdom Governments provide the opportunity for United Kingdom participation in SDI research in a number of advanced areas, of which examples have been placed in the Library. The Ministry of Defence will assist United Kingdom organisations who so wish, and have relevent capabilities, to participate in such areas.

39. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the Soviet strategic defence initiative; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) on 26 November 1985, at columns 562-64.

49. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Defence if United Kingdom companies taking part in strategic defence initiative research will be free to exploit the results of their research independently.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The memorandum of understanding and supporting documentation related to British participation in the SDI research programme provide satisfactory safeguards in, amongst others, the area of intellectual property rights. The documentation is confidential.

50. Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the implications for his policy on the strategic defence initiative of the proposals in the recent publication by Dr. Colin Gray, "Britain and the SDI", a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Her Majesty's Government welcome the publication of any material which enhances the public debate on the strategic defence initiative. The United Kingdom's position on this subject remains as set out by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence in the House on 19 February 19816.

52. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to discuss with his American counterpart the possibility of British contracts connected with the strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My right hon. Friend will be able to discuss any current matters affecting United Kingdom participation in SDI research when he meets Mr. Weinberger during his visit to London next week.

Supersonic VSTOL Aircraft

36. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans his Department has for the development of a supersonic vertical short take-off and landing aircraft; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: There is as yet no established requirement for such an aircraft. We are, however, undertaking studies of relevant technologies jointly with the United States Government under the terms of a memorandum of understanding signed on 23 January 1986.

Royal Ordnance plc

37. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the support given by his Department to Royal Ordnance plc, in furtherance of export contracts.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My Department's general policy is to give the same comprehensive support to Royal Ordnance plc as it does to any other United Kingdom company engaged in defence exports. One exception to this is a special facility over a transitional period which allows the company to draw on Ministry of Defence owned spares for royal ordnance factory products. Another exception to this general policy is set out in Cmnd. 9746.

Small Firms (Tendering)

38. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on current measures taken to publicise procedures for small firms tendering for Ministry of Defence contracts.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Publicity is primarily provided by a booklet produced by my Department and entitled "Selling to the MOD". It was first published in September 1983, and some 45,000 copies have been distributed at trade fairs, through trade associations and to individual companies. A second edition is in the course of preparation.

In addition MOD officials attend and address functions and seminars arranged by industry and by small firms organisations. Officials also participate in events organised by chambers of commerce, industrial development associations, enterprise agencies and similar organisations.

Type 23 Frigates

Mr. Duffy asked the Secreary of State for Defence what annual average ordering rate of type 23 frigates is needed if the fleet in the 1990s is to reach its target of around 50 destroyers and frigates.

Mr. Lee: It is our intention to maintain a surface escort fleet of about 50 destroyers and frigates and this would imply an ordering rate of around three new vessels per year. However, these figures are subject both to availability of resources and the length of hull life.

Nuclear Warheads

41. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the balance of the intermediate range nuclear warheads held by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation countries and the Warsaw pact countries in Europe.

Mr. Stanley: Information on the nuclear forces of the Warsaw Pact and NATO is contained in annex A of volume 1 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985". We plan to update this information in the Statement of Defence Estimates for 1986.

Chemical Weapons

42. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he intends to meet the United States Defence Secretary to discuss modernisation and deployment of United States chemical weapons in Europe; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend has no plans for a specific meeting with the United States Defence Secretary to discuss this particular issue. He will meet the United States Defence Secretary for both bilateral and NATO discussions later this month.

51. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations will take place between Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe and Her Majesty's Government before a decision is reached on any new deployment of chemical weapons in Europe by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) on 7 March, at column 313. The United States Government have indicated that they have no plans to deploy binary chemical weapons in any foreign country in peacetime and that should such a deployment be considered in the future the United States would consult beforehand with the countries concerned.

Defence Budget

43. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received about the defence budget.

Mr. Stanley: Since 1 January 1986, three letters relating to this subject have been received from right hon. and hon. Members, and five have been received direct from the general public.

Cruise Missiles (RAF Molesworth)

46. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will consider a delay in the deployment of cruise missiles at Molesworth in view of recent Soviet proposals.

Mr. Stanley: No.

Ballistic Theatre Missile Defences

47. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his West German counterpart on the development of European ballistic theatre missile defences.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence met his West German counterpart, Dr. Manfred Woerner, in West Germany on 17 February, when a wide variety of subjects of mutual defence interest were discussed. Among these subjects was the possibility of improving NATO's air defences in Europe. Details of the discussions are, of course, confidential.

Crown Proceedings Act 1947

48. Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received concerning the abolition of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947.

Mr. Lee: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave to the right hon. Gentleman on 20 February 1986, at column 326.

Ulster Defence Regiment

53. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any changes in the role and deployment of the Ulster Defence Regiment have been made following the conclusion of the Anglo-Irish agreement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: As I said to my hon. Friend in my reply to him on 22 January, at column 237, there are no plans to change the operational role of the Ulster Defence Regiment. There are also no plans to make any significant changes in deployments at present although detailed deployments of course vary from day to day in response to operational needs.

BP Shipping Co. Ltd. (Tankers)

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the role of the BP Shipping Company Ltd's oil tankers in the defence interests of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Stanley: Defence planning includes the use of oil tankers of varying sizes in support of Royal Navy operations.

Holy Loch

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has as to the presence of cobalt 60 in the waters of the Holy Loch.

Mr. Lee: There is no measurable level of cobalt 60 in the waters of the Holy Loch.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will institute an independent inquiry into the level of radioactivity in the silts at the head of Holy Loch.

Mr. Lee: No.

The levels of radioactivity in the sediment at the Holy Loch are monitored regularly, and the results published by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in its aquatic environment monitoring reports, copies of which are in the Library of the House. The Strathclyde regional council also commissioned an independent study of radioactivity in the Firth of Clyde, including the Holy Loch, the results of which were published in 1985. There is no scientific evidence of hazardous radioactivity from submarines operations in the Holy Loch. There is therefore no case for an independent inquiry.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has commissioned any studies into the levels of radiation emitted by the reactors of nuclear submarines based in the Holy Loch on (a) start-up and (b) flushing-out.

Mr. Lee: The level of radiation emitted from nuclear submarine reactors is very low. Routine radioactive discharges from nuclear submarines directly into the environment are not permitted. Routine radioactive discharges are permitted from the depot ship; the very low levels of radioactivity are published in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's aquatic environment monitoring reports, copies of which are in the Library of the House. Routine monitoring of the inter-tidal zones shows levels indistinguishable from those in areas remote from nuclear facilities.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the creation of a restricted military zone at the vicinity of the Holy Loch was brought into being at the request of the United States navy.

Mr. Stanley: No restrictions other than those under the dockyard port of the Holy Loch Order 1967 currently apply to the area. Draft byelaws regulating the use of the protected anchorages in the Holy Loch for defence purposes will shortly be advertised locally for public comment. These have been prepared on the initiative of this Department. The United States Navy has been consulted.

ENVIRONMENT

Sellafield

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the chemical constituent components of the discharge from Sellafield on 23 January in terms of concentrations of organic and aqueous solvents, including an inventory of any quantities of tri-butyl phosphate, nitric acid, sulphuric acid and sodium nitrate contained within the discharge together with the concentration of uranium metal, by parts per million, carried in solution or otherwise within the discharged liquor.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information on the chemical components referred to is as follows:

	In parts per million, by weight
Organic solvents: tri-butyl phosphate	27
Odourless kerosene	3
Free Nitric Acid	0
Free Sulphuric Acid	0
Sodium Salts	about 1,000
Uranium (as Ammonium diuranate associated with ferric hydroxide floc)	300

No uranium metal was present.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment to what extent (a) operator error and (b) plant malfunction contributed to the circumstances precipitating need for the discharge from Sellafield to the Irish sea on 23 January; whether this discharge was wholly made following a prior instruction from British Nuclear Fuels Limited management; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The release of uranium was initiated by a plant malfunction which led to material reaching the sea tanks, and it was terminated by operator action to control the malfunction. The discharge from the sea tanks took place later, after consideration by British Nuclear Fuels management and a decision by it that this was the appropriate action. The circumstances are the subject of investigations by the Radiochemical Inspectorate and the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate.

Nuclear Waste

Sir Peter Emery asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, as part of its search for available sites for the disposal of shorter-lived nuclear waste, the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive has now concluded that there are no suitable sites in east Devon and Lyme bay: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The sites announced by my right hon. Friend on 25 February are the only ones which NIREX proposes to investigate in connection with the development of a near-surface facility.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he is prepared to receive a deputation from the Barnetby parish council to discuss proposals for nuclear waste disposal in the area; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he is prepared to receive a deputation from the Ukeby parish council to discuss proposals for nuclear waste disposal in the area; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he is prepared to receive a deputation from the Immingham town council to discuss proposals for the disposal of nuclear waste in the area; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he is prepared to receive a deputation from South Killingholme parish council to discuss proposals for the disposal of nuclear waste in the area; and if he will make a statement;

(5) if he is prepared to receive a deputation from North Killingholme parish council to discuss proposals for the disposal of nuclear waste in the area; and if he will make a statement;

(6) if he is prepared to receive a deputation from the East Halton parish council to discuss proposals for the disposal of nuclear waste in the area; and if he will make a statement;

(7) if he is prepared to receive a deputation from Cleethorpes borough council to discuss proposals for the disposal of nuclear waste in the area; and if he will make a statement;

(8) if he is prepared to receive a deputation from Humberside county council to discuss proposals for the disposal of nuclear waste in the area; and if he will make a statement;

(9) if he is prepared to receive a deputation from the Glanford borough council to discuss proposals for the disposal of nuclear waste in the area; and if he will make a statement;

(10) if he is prepared to receive a deputation from the Barrow on Humber parish council to discuss proposals for the disposal of nuclear waste in the area; and if he will make a statement;

(11) if he is prepared to receive a deputation from the Barton on Humber town council to discuss proposals for the disposal of nuclear waste in the area; and if he will make a statement;

(12) if he is prepared to receive a deputation from the organisation known as Humberside Against Nuclear Dumping to discuss proposals for the disposal of nuclear waste in the area; and if he will make a statement;

(13) if he is prepared to receive a deputation from the New Holland parish council to discuss proposals for the disposal of nuclear waste in the area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall be happy to meet, on behalf of my right hon. Friend, a deputation led by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what interval he intends to allow at the end of the consultation period in respect of the proposals for nuclear waste disposal announced in the statement he made to the House on 25 February, before he lays a special development order before Parliament; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend hopes to lay the order before Parliament in late April.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions special development orders have been laid before Parliament since 1970.

Mr. Waldegrave: Twelve special development orders have been laid and made in England and Wales since 1970.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what factors he proposes to take into account in deciding whether to amend the draft special development order relating to nuclear waste disposal before the order is laid before Parliament.

Mr. Waldegrave: Any proposed amendments will be considered on their merits.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the names of all sites which have been considered by the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive at some stage since 1 January 1985 as possibilities for the disposal of nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: No.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information his Department has about the geology of South and North Killingholme in relation to the feasibility of dumping nuclear waste;

(2) if he will make it his policy to arrange for a separate assessment of the analyses of the results of the geological studies to be undertaken by the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive at the four sites proposed for possible nuclear waste dumping; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will make an independent assessment of any proposals put forward by NIREX. The assessment will include the results of geological studies undertaken by NIREX of the sites involved.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the precise geological, demographic and safety features which led the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive to conclude that South Killingholme was potentially attractive as a nuclear waste dump.

Mr. Waldegrave: I understand that NIREX has recently sent my hon. Friend a copy of the brochure explaining its site selection procedures.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to allocate special resources from his Department to local authorities and others in Humberside to assist with defraying any reasonable expenses incurred in presenting to a public inquiry their views on nuclear dumping in South Killingholme.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is not Government policy to give financial aid to local authorities and objectors at public inquiries of this nature.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive has at any time considered the possibility of selecting a site in the county of Surrey for investigation as a possible nuclear waste dump; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive has at any time considered the possibility of selecting a site in the Greater London council area for investigation as a possible nuclear waste dump; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive has at any time considered the possibility of selecting a site in the county of Avon for investigation as a possible nuclear waste dump; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The decisions on which sites to investigate and which to propose were matters for NIREX.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he has had with bodies, apart from the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive, to assist him in formulating his policy regarding nuclear waste disposal.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend consults widely in formulating radioactive waste policy. Those consulted include other Government Departments, the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee, the National Radiological Protection Board, enviromental groups and the nuclear industry.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the factors to be addressed in assessing any proposals which the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive may present to a public inquiry relating to the disposal of nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: The principles to be applied in the assessment by the relevant Departments, in considering whether to give a general authorisation under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 for any proposed disposal facility are set out in a booklet published by my Department in January 1985; "Disposal Facilities on Land for Low and Intermediate-Level Radioactive Wastes: Principles for the Protection of the Human Environment". Copies are available in the Library. It also lists the factors NIREX has to address in preparing an environmental assessment for consideration at a public inquiry into development proposals. In addition, the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate is preparing principles relating to its own responsibilities for disposal sites.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to visit the site selected by the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive in South Killingholme for possible nuclear waste disposal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I intend to visit each of the alternative sites in due course. I will inform the hon. Members concerned when I have firm plans.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received relating to the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive's proposals to investigate South Killingholme as a possible site for the dumping of nuclear waste; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have received a number of representations from hon. Members representing Humberside constituencies. I met my hon. Friend and the hon. Members for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) on 17 December to discuss the question of sites. I have also received representations from local authorities and residents of the South Humberside area. I am aware that a petition has been presented to Parliament. My Department's Yorkshire and Humberside regional director has recently received a similar petition.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent discussions he has had with the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board relating to the disposal of nuclear waste; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The civil nuclear power programme is an important contributor to the volume of radioactive waste expected in the future; and not unexpectedly it is a subject the chairman has raised with me when we have met informally, as for example we shall do when I have lunch with the CEGB on 26 March.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to be in a position to announce authorisation for the commissioning of a nuclear waste dump; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The stage of formal authorisation under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 will not be reached until a facility has been built. This will probably not be until the early 1990s assuming that one of the four sites announced proves suitable. The authorising Departments will, however, give their provisional view on whether any facility subsequently proposed for development would be suitable for authorisation, before a public inquiry is held into that proposal. Consultations with the local planning authority and other bodies will take place before that view is given. An inquiry is unlikely to be held before late 1988 at the earliest.

Norwegian Environment Minister (Visit)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the itinerary of the Norwegian Environment Minister on her forthcoming visit to the United Kingdom, and the nature of the agenda for discussions; and whether acid rain will be among the main items to be discussed.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Norwegian Minister of Environment, Mrs. Rakel Surlien, will visit the United Kingdom at the Government's invitation from 17 to 19 March, for discussions with Ministers and others on matters of common interest in environmental pollution control, including atmospheric pollution and acid rain. Mrs. Surlien's programme will also include visits to the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology (Edinburgh), a coal-fired power station (Fiddlers Ferry, Warrington), and the Mersey Basin campaign; and a presentation on the proposed Dounreay European demonstration nuclear fuel reprocessing plant.

Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many meetings he has had with Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive since April 1985;

(2) on how many occasions he has met the chairman of Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive since 8 January 1986.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend and I, and members of my Department, have met NIREX and its representatives from time to time since April 1985 to discuss issues that were within our respective responsibilities, in pursuit of the Government's published policy on the disposal of radioactive waste.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy that, in the event of a local authority failing to make its 1986-87 rate by 31 March, the rate support grant will not be paid to that authority until it has made a lawful rate.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am advised that the payment of rate support grant cannot under present legislaton be made contingent upon the making of a rate.

Natterjack Toad

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the changes of breeding status for the natterjack toad which have occurred during the last 10 years; and if acidification of breeding ponds has played a major role in these changes.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am advised by the Nature Conservancy Council that the most recent survey of natterjack toad populations, carried out in 1980, concluded that there had been no significant changes in breeding status of this species since the early 1970s.

Acidification has generally not been a problem, since most breeding sites are within areas of calcareous sand dunes. However, there is concern about acidification at one heathland site in southern England and the Nature Conservancy Council is funding an investigation there.

Acid Rain

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his policy in representing the United Kingdom's position on acid rain in the light of the video on acid rain issued by the Central Electricity Generating Board, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government's policy on acid rain is set out in our reply (Cmnd. 9397) to the report of the Select Committee on the Environment. The Central Electricity Generating Board's video is entirely a matter for the board.

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many payments of £1 have been received by him as part of the acid rain campaign organised by Friends of the Earth.

Mrs. Rumbold: A total of £874 has been received to date.

Canary Wharf

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now commission an environmental impact analysis in connection with proposals for the development on Canary wharf in the Isle of Dogs.

Sir George Young: No, but the LDDC is currently undertaking a series of wider appraisals of the development which will consider its economic, social and environmental impact.

Asbestos

Mr. Shore asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what technical advice has been given to local authorities about the further use or removal of asbestos as a building material in council houses and flats; and how much additional finance Government have made available for remedial purposes in each year since 1978.

Sir George Young: The Department of the Environment issued a technical guidance note on asbestos materials in buildings in August 1983. Copies were sent to all local authorities in England and Wales. The guidance note is at present being revised and updated, and will be re-issued later this year. Funds are not made available specifically for remedial work on asbestos, but rate support grant is paid in support of authorities' revenue expenditure generally, including expenditure on asbestos.

London Borough Grant Scheme

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of the contribution made by each borough to the London borough grant scheme.

Sir George Young: The budget of the London borough grant scheme, and so the contributions of individual authorities, is a matter for the boroughs and not for me. But section 48(3) of the Local Government Act 1985 provides that each authority's contribution to the scheme shall be in proportion to its population.

Consent Applications

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 6 March, Official Report, columns 278-79, if he will identify the outstanding applications for consent on which he is awaiting further information requested from the Greater London council.

Mr. Tracey: These applications are as follows. In four cases the information requested has since been received; consent has been issued in one case.

Local Authorities (Grants)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish, for each local authority, the reductions in block grant, compared with the December block grant entitlements in columns 6, 7 and 8 of the tables showing grant entitlements, consistent with the guaranteed total of recycled grant for 1986-87.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Authorities block grant entitlements will depend on their own spending decisions. This information is not yet available. A wide range of spending assumptions would produce £500 million of grant for recycling.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the extra block grant available to local authorities in 1986-87 in addition to the £8,280 million originally announced in December 1985.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: £22 million. I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 12 February 1986, at column 463, to the hon. Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves) for details.

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the average cost in inner city areas per unit of accommodation of (a) housing management and (b) housing repairs and maintenance for local authority housing.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 7 March 1986, c. 286]: In 1984-85, inner city authorities spent on average £213·9 per dwelling on supervision and management for their housing stock, and £257·5 per dwelling in revenue expenditure on repairs and maintenance.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Potatoes

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total hectarage of potatoes grown in the United Kingdom in the crop year 1985-86; and how much of this was subject to the ordinary levy of the Potato Marketing Board.

Mr. Gummer: The total field area of potatoes in the United Kingdom in the crop year 1985-86 is provisionally forecast as 192,300 hectares. All plantings of potatoes in Great Britain by producers registered with the Potato Marketing Board are subject to the board's ordinary area levy. The board estimates that such plantings amounted to 162,720 hectares in 1985-86, of which approximately 8,500 hectares were also subject to the payment of excess area levy.

The difference between the areas of potatoes in the United Kingdom and in Great Britain is accounted for by plantings in Northern Ireland (13,000 hectares approximately), plantings by unregistered producers in Great Britain (5,000 hectares approximately) and by the fact that the PMB statistics are based on planted area, which disregards unplanted parts of fields, such as headlands and ditches (11,000 hectares approximately).

Farm Prices

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will resist any proposals in the European Economic Community Agriculture Council on farm prices which would breach the strict budgetary controls on spending agreed at the Dublin summit.

Mr. Jopling: I have made it clear to the Council that the Government oppose the Commission's proposals for the 1986-87 price fixing because among other things they would breach the reference framework for 1986 as presently calculated.

Spending Trends

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the Commission last submitted a monthly report to the Council of Ministers about trends in agricultural spending under paragraph 6*(b)* of the decision of the Council of 4 December 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The Commission has not recently produced a formal monthly report to the Council but makes available to the member states each month a detailed analysis of current agricultural expenditure.

EC (Expenditure)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the Commission has submitted any report to the Council of Ministers under the early warning procedure of possible budget overruns on agricultural spending under paragraph 6(b) of the decision of the Council of 4 December 1984 in the current calendar year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The Commission has not specifically reported under this procedure but has included in its 1986 price fixing proposals an analysis of the budgetary situation, which indicated that, in its view, a supplementary budget will be required in 1986.

Waste Dumping (River Tyne)

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many occasions in the last 12 months the MV David Marley and the MV Adderstone have requested a location fix from the coastal radar station whilst dumping waste off the mouth of the River Tyne under licence.

Mr. Gummer: I understand that the MV David Marley and the MV Adderstone have their own equipment to establish their position at sea and therefore have not needed to request location fixes from the coastal radar station during disposal operations off the mouth of the River Tyne.

Broilermeat and Chickenmeat

Mr. Eadie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the imports of broilermeat and chickenmeat in Scotland, England and Wales in the years 1983, 1984, 1985 and to the nearest available date in 1986; and if he will give the ports of entry.

Mr. Gummer I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Frozen Chickens (Imports)

Mr. Eadie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many prosecutions took place for imported frozen chickens in 1983, 1984, 1985 and to the nearest available date in 1986; and if he will list the countries involved in the imports.

Mr. Gummer: The port health and food and drugs authorities are responsible for enforcement of the Imported Food Regulations 1984 and the European Community's regulations on the water content of frozen chickens. They are not required to inform my Department of prosecutions but I am aware of two successful prosecutions for excess water content since 1983—one in December 1985 and the other in February 1986. The countries of origin were France in the first case and Denmark in the second.

EC (Farm Statistics)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each year since 1979 for the European Community as a whole (a) the amount devoted in the European Community budget to agriculture, (b) the estimate of the number of farmers in the European Community and (c) the cost per farmer of the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Jopling: The information requested is as follows:

(a) Cost of the common agricultural policy excluding fisheries

	Mecus
1979	10,834·4
1980	11,900·0
1981	11,531·0
1982	13,021·9
1983	16,582·0
1984	19,031·6
1985	20,594·7

The 1985 figure is for Budget appropriations net of transfers; those for earlier years are outturn.

(b) Censuses of Community farmers are not carried out on an annual basis. In 1977 the number of agricultural holdings in the Community of Nine and Greece was 6,520,000. For 1983, the latest year for which figures are available, the number of holdings in the Community of Ten is provisionally put at 6,518,000.

(c) On the basis of Community holdings of 6,520,000 the cost per holding of the common agricultural policy is

	Ecus
1979	1,662
1980	1,825
1981	1,769
1982	1,997
1983	2,543
1984	2,919
1985	3,159

Pesticides

Mr. McCrindle asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will introduce maximum pesticide residue levels for all crops in collaboration with other European Economic Community countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Certain maximum residue levels for pesticides on fruit and vegetables have been adopted by the European Community and these have been notified to food and drugs authorities in the United Kingdom as presumptive standards under the Food Acts. Proposals for maximum residue limits for certain pesticides on cereals and on foodstuffs of animal origin are still under discussion in the Community.

Sellafield

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what limits are placed on the chemical, as distinct from radiochemical, constituents of discharges from Sellafield to the Irish sea; and if he will place in the Library a copy of the authorisations issued to British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. in this respect.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have been asked to reply.

Under the Control of Pollution Act 1974 conditions to control discharges into coastal waters have recently been introduced. Under these conditions BNFL made application to the North-Western water authority to discharge components which are not radiochemical and thereby obtained deemed consent to continue its discharges to the Irish Sea. The authorisation is on the public register and a copy will be placed in the Library. The conditions for discharge will be periodically reviewed.

Intervention Stores

Mr. Teddy Talyor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total amount of various perishable foodstuffs and fish, respectively, which were withdrawn from the market by the intervention board in 1985; and what part of each of these totals was destroyed.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 4 March 1986, c. 89]: Estimated 1985 United Kingdom production of apples, pears, cauliflowers and tomatoes was 731,800 tonnes of which 16,663 tonnes (2·3 per cent) were withdrawn from the market and 11,660 tonnes (1·6 per cent.) destroyed. Provisional landings of fish in the same period were 753,000 tonnes of which 36,784 tonnes (4·9 per cent.) were withdrawn and 456 tonnes (0·06 per cent.) destroyed.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Wines, Spirits, Beer and Tobacco

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many workers were employed in the wines and spirits industry in Northern Ireland in June 1979; and how many at the latest available date;

(2) how many workers were employed in the brewing industry in Northern Ireland in June 1979; and how many at the latest available date;

(3) how many workers were employed in the tobacco industry in Northern Ireland in June 1979; and how many at the latest available date.

Dr. Boyson: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Contraceptives (Minors)

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any plans to circulate doctors in Northern Ireland to ensure that they are aware that the guidelines on the issuing of contraceptives to minors do not apply in that region.

Mr. Needham: I have no plans to circulate doctors at this stage. The advice on family planning in Northern Ireland, which has not changed since 1975, is to be reviewed in the light of the Law Lords' judgments in the Gillick case and the revised guidance on provision of contraceptives to minors issued recently by the Department of Health and Social Security. Doctors in Northern Ireland will be notified of the results of this review—confirming the existing guidance or advising of any changes in the guidance, as appropriate.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Housing Benefit

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pensioner households lost all housing benefit as a result of the changes which came into effect in November 1985; and, of these, how many were tenants and how many owner-occupiers.

Mr. Major: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the average delay between claiming, and receiving the first payment of, housing benefit for each year since the system was introduced.

Mr. Major: Responsibility for the administration of the housing benefit scheme rests with the individual local authorities. Information about the speed with which claims are processed is not collected centrally.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claimants in Bradford have received exceptionally severe weather payments in 1986; if he will list the number of payments made each week, to date, in the current year; how many other offices of his Department in west Yorkshire have made such payments this year; if he will give information about weekly payments made by each office, to date, this year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Information on the number of single payments made for extra fuel used during the recent period of exceptionally severe weather is not yet available. When the period during which such payments are likely to be so made is over, each local office will be asked to make a return giving the total number of payments made, and the total cost of such payments.

Abortions

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the abortion rates among resident girls under 16 years of age between March 1984 and June 1985.

Mr. Hayhoe: The table shows quarterly numbers and rates for March 1984 to June 1985 inclusive, together with an annual figure and an annual rate for 1984, for notifications of legal abortions carried out under the Abortion Act 1967.

Administration (Staffing)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many staff, whole-time equivalents, were employed by his Department on National Health Service administration in 1978-79 and in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Whitney: The number of staff employed in the Department of Health and Social Security on work relating to the administration of the National Health Service in 1978-79 was 1048. This compares with the latest available figure for the current year, 1985-86, of 772.

NHS (Drug Purchasing)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what the National Health Service expects to spend on the purchase of drugs in 1986-87 compared with 1985-86 and 1984-85.

Mr. Hayhoe: The information requested is:

Departmental Office, Bloomsbury

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of the live caseloads at Bloomsbury local Department of Health and Social Security office, Tavistock square, are still awaiting the November 1985 benefit uprating; and how many are still awaiting the November 1984 uprating.

Mr. Major: None. Both benefit uprating exercises have been completed.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many new claims for social security were made in the past 12 months to the Bloomsbury local Department of Health and Social Security office at Tavistock square; how many of these are still awaiting assessment; and how long they have, on average, been awaiting assessment.

Mr. Major: Information is not available in the precise form requested. 12,228 supplementary benefit claims were cleared in the 12 months up to 11 February 1986. On that date 202 claims were still awaiting assessment. On average, claims are processed within three weeks; this includes the time taken, in some cases, to collect additional information from claimants.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many live claims for social security the Bloomsbury local Department of Health and Social Security office at Tavistock square is currently handling.

Mr. Major: On 11 February 1986 the total number of live cases was 9,194. This is marginally more than the figure for claimants receiving supplementary benefit on that date, as it includes some cases of claimants whose benefit entitlement had recently finished.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many requests for home visits have been received by Bloomsbury local Department of Health and Social Security office, Tavistock square, in the past 12 months; how many are currently outstanding; and, on average, for how long they have been outstanding.

Mr. Major: Records are not kept of the number of requests for home visits. In the 12 months up to 11 February 1986, 3,775 home visits were made and 178 visits were outstanding on that date. This includes visits initiated by the local office. Over the 12 months period, visits have taken on average about three to four weeks to clear, but now they are being made more quickly.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will state the approved and actual staffing levels at the Bloomsbury local Department of Health and Social Security office, Tavistock square, in March 1981, March 1983, March 1985 and today; and if he will give the number of live claims in the office for each of these dates.

Mr. Major: Information is not available in the precise form requested. The information that is available is as follows:

	Complement March	Staff in post on 1 March	Number of cases in action—February
1981	52	*	*
1983	67	75	7,239
1985	76	92	8,682
1986	90	94	9,194

* Not available

Note In July 1984 there was a boundary change which resulted in five posts being transferred from Bloomsbury area office to Euston integrated local office.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many urgent needs payments have been made in the last 12 months by the Bloomsbury local Department of Health and Social Security office, Tavistock square; and how many are currently outstanding.

Mr. Major: In the 12 months up to 11 February 1986, 1,557 urgent needs payments were made and on that date (the latest for which figures are available) none was outstanding.

Taste and Smell Mechanism

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people are estimated to have suffered from loss of sense of smell in 1985, 1975, 1965 and 1956;

(2) what are the principal reasons known to his Department for loss of the sense of smell;

(3) what hospitals specialise in treatment for loss of smell.

Mr. Whitney: In many cases loss of sense of smell is a side-effect or symptom of an underlying condition. The principal reasons for temporary loss of sense of smell are common ailments such as colds and hay fever. Head injury or local trauma can also result in loss of this sense, which can on occasion be long-lasting or permanent. Causes of loss of sense of smell are too diverse for reliable estimates to be made of numbers of people affected. Such conditions are treated, in hospital or in the community, according to clinical indications. Some need no treatment and for others, unfortunately, no reliable treatments are yet available. We are not aware of any hospital specialising in this.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what research sponsored by his Department has taken place and is taking place into how the taste and smell mechanism works;

(2) what research sponsored by his Department is currently taking place into the loss of the sense of smell.

Mr. Whitney: The Department has not sponsored nor is currently sponsoring any research into how the taste and smell mechanism works or into the loss of sense of smell. The main Government-funded body undertaking bio-medical research is the Medical Research Council, which is funded by grant-in-aid from the science Vote of the Department of Education and Science.

Ageusic Anosmic

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what grants are made by his Department to Ageusic Anosmic.

Mr. Whitney: We have received no application for grant-aid from this organisation.

Residential Care (Supplementary Benefit)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the number of persons in residential care who are disaggregated for the purposes of supplementary benefit but whose partners are still asked to contribute to their maintenance as a liable relative; what is his policy in such circumstances where the partner is in employment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: There are no figures from which such an estimate could be made, but the number of cases where a liable relative is required to contribute when supplementary benefit is paid in respect of a spouse in residential care is thought to be small. In considering any liability to maintain under the supplementary benefit legislation, account is taken of any contribution already being made towards the claimant's accommodation.

Organ Transplants

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give his Department's best estimate of the percentage of the population who (a) take kidney donor cards, (b) fill in kidney donor cards and (c) carry kidney donor cards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: A Gallup poll conducted on behalf of the British Kidney Patient Association in January this year suggested that 21 per cent. of the population carried an organ donor card and that a further 7 per cent. had an organ donor card which they were not carrying at the time. We would like all people who are willing for their kidneys and other organs to be used for transplantation after their death to sign and carry a donor card and to let their relatives know.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if any assessment has been made of the number of occasions in which the next-of-kin of dead persons have expressed regret at not having been asked permission to remove the organs of the dead person for transplant purposes; if he will consider commissioning a short inquiry to research such donor organ losses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: We are not aware of any such assessment. The decision whether organs are to be removed from cadavers is a clinical one for the doctors concerned, but nevertheless it is helpful if relatives inform the doctors if they know that a dead person wished to be an organ donor. I informed the hon. Member in my reply of 4 March, at column 123, of a study which we are considering supporting.

Infertility

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women per thousand population have sought treatment for infertility in each of the last five years for which figures are available in (a) England and Wales and (b) Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hayhoe: Information collected centrally is given in the table for the most recent years available. Figures for Wales and Northern Ireland are a matter for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and Northern Ireland.

NHS non-psychiatric hospitals, England

1983	1·04

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has concerning the total cost to his Department of the treatment for infertility of women in their main childbearing years in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) England and Wales in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret this information is not available centrally.

Venereal Disease

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has concerning the number of women aged over 24 years per 1,000 women in the population who sought treatment for venereal diseases in (a) England and Wales and (b) Northern Ireland in each of the last five years for which figures are available;

(2) what information he has concerning the number of women aged under 24 years per 1,000 women in the population who sought treatment for venereal diseases in (a) England and Wales and (b) Northern Ireland in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Hayhoe: Statistics on sexually transmitted diseases by age group are collected centrally only for primary and secondary syphilis and post pubertal gonorrhoea. Figures for Wales and Northern Ireland are a matter for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and Northern Ireland. The available information is given in the table.

Cervical Cancer

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has concerning the incidence of cervical cancer per 1,000 women in the population (a) in England and Wales and (b) in Northern Ireland in women aged under 24 years in each of the last five years for which figures are available;

(2) what information he has concerning the incidence of cervical cancer per 1,000 women in the population (a) in England and Wales and (b) in Northern Ireland in women aged over 24 years in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Hayhoe: The tables show the latest available information on registrations of newly diagnosed cases or malignant neoplasm of cervix uteri, and of carcinoma-in-situ of cervix uteri.

Contraception

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has concerning the total amount paid to doctors specifically for the prescription of contraceptive drugs and devices per 1,000 population in (a) England and Wales and (b) Northern Ireland in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Hayhoe: General medical practitioners do not receive any specific payment for prescribing contraceptive substances or any other drugs and appliances. For the provision of contraceptive services (which may or may not include the prescribing of contraceptive substances) payments per 1,000 population were made to general medical practitioners in England and Wales as follows:

Conception Statistics

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many girls per 1,000 population aged under 16 years at the time of conception have (a) given birth, (b) miscarried or (c) had abortions in (i) Northern Ireland and (ii) England and Wales in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Hayhoe: The following table shows the information available on conceptions that lead to maternity in Northern Ireland and England and Wales and those that are terminated under the Abortion Act 1967 in England and Wales. Information on miscarriages is not available in the form requested.

Pelvic Inflammatory Diseases

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women per 1,000 population sought treatment for pelvic inflammatory diseases in each of the last five years for which figures are available in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) England and Wales.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret this information for England is not available as it is not collected centrally. Figures for Wales and Northern Ireland are a matter for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Northern Ireland.

Leeds Western Health Authority

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what representations he has received from the chairman of the Yorkshire regional health authority regarding the chairmanship of the Leeds western health authority;

(2) why Mr. Robin Good is not being reappointed as chairman of the Leeds western health authority;

(3) what representations he has received from medical staff in relation to the chairmanship of the Leeds western health authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

AIDS

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what experts have been consulted by his Department to assist with preparation for the forthcoming information campaign on acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Hayhoe: Members of the expert advisory group on AIDS and representatives of the Health Education Council, the Terrence Higgins Trust, the Standing Conference on Drug Abuse and the College of Health have been among those consulted.

Prescription Charges

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received concerning blanket exemptions from prescription charges for the elderly and children; and if consideration has been given to a means-tested system for prescription charges within those categories; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Many representations are received regarding the prescription charge exemption arrangements, the vast majority of which seek additions to the present exempt categories. Automatic exemption of the elderly and children was one of the many points raised in a letter from the British Medical Association.

As I made clear in my statement to the House on 10 March at column 671, I have no plans to change the existing range of exemptions or the list of exempted medical conditions.

Hypothermia

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, for the United Kingdom, and for England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland separately, the number of deaths with any mention of hypothermia on the death certificate for the year 1985; and if he will break down the figures by (a) month of the year and (b) by age groups (i) under 25, (ii) 25 to 34, (iii) 35 to 44, (iv) 45 to 54, (v) 55 to 64, (vi) 65 to 74, (vii) 75 to 84 and (viii) 85 years and over.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 3 March 1986, c. 64]: The tables show the provisional numbers of deaths with any mention of hypothermia on the death certificate, irrespective of whether it did or did not appear as the underlying cause of death for the United Kingdom and its constituent countries for 1985 by age group and month of registration.

Social Security Reform

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what will be the housing benefit paid to (a) a single person aged under 18 years, (b) a single person aged under 25 years, (c) a single person aged 25 to 59 years, (d) a couple without children where rates and rent are (i) 25 per cent., below average, (ii) average and (iii) 25 per cent., above average and gross weekly income is (1) at the level of unemployment benefit, (2) earnings of £45, (3) £55, (4) £65, (5) £75, (6) £85, (7) £95, (8) £110 and (9) £125 a week under current provisions and under the assumptions set out in the technical annex to Cmnd. 9691; and in each case at what level of income the entitlement to housing benefit would disappear.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1986, c. 157-58]: The information is given in the following tables.

Notes to tables

1. The average weekly rent and domestic rates levels have been assumed to be £13·80 and £5·20 respectively.
2. The current minimum rent rebate and rate rebate levels of 50 pence have been used throughout.
3. The level at which housing benefit is not payable had been calculated for an earning single person/couple.
4. In the case of an earning couple it has been assumed that only one partner is in work.
5. The current income tax allowances, national insurance rates and unemployment benefit rates have been used throughout.
6. Other assumptions are based on the illustrative figures used in the technical annex to Cmnd. 9691, with a 20 per cent. contribution towards rates.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the number of (a) single people aged under 18 years, (b) single people aged 18 years to 24 years, (c) single people aged 25 years to 59 years and (d) couples where the claimant is aged under 25 years who currently receive some housing benefit; and approximately how many in each category will lose all their housing benefit under the proposals in the Social Security Bill, on the assumptions in the technical annex to Cmnd. 9691.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1986, c. 157-58]: Using the illustrative assumptions in the technical annex to the White Paper (Cmnd. 9691) the information requested is as follows:

Housing benefit: caseload and numbers affected by proposals

	Estimated number of recipients under present scheme	Estimated number of recipients affected with no residual entitlement

Notes:
(1) Present scheme estimates have been made on a similar basis to that outlined in paragraphs 2.6 to 2.10 of the technical annex. The caseloads shown here are consistent with the caseloads underlying the technical annex tables.
(2) The estimates are not adjusted for differential take-up.
(3) The estimates exclude single parents and couples with children.
(4) * Indicates estimates of less than 5,000.

Sickness Benefit

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people received reduced rate sickness benefit in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and how many of these subsequently obtained invalidity benefit.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1986, c.161]: The number of claims giving rise to entitlement to sickness benefit at the reduced rate is provisionally estimated at 41,000 in 1983-84 and 28,000 in 1984-85. The number of these going on to obtain invalidity benefit was 4,000 and 5,000, respectively. I regret that the information is not available for earlier years.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the annual cost of paying sickness benefit to anyone who had paid or been credited with contributions on earnings of 25 times the lower earnings limit in the relevant tax year.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1986, c. 161]: On the evidence available, an estimated £120 million in 1986-87, of which approximately £2 million is attributable to people with contributions paid or credited on earnings between 25 and 49 times the lower earnings limit.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the number of people each year who will fail to qualify for invalidity benefit as a result of the proposal in the Social Security Bill to abolish reduced rate sickness benefit.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1986, c.161]: 6,500 in 1987-88.

Genito-Urinary Treatment

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what genito-urinary treatment he expects will be available on a continuing basis in the Lewisham and North Southwark district after 1 April.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986]: I understand that the Lewisham and North Southwark health authority has recently consulted publicly on the future of genito-urinary services in the district. Services are now concentrated, with the local community health council's agreement, on one site, the Lloyd clinic at Guy's hospital. The health authority plans to improve the service during the next financial year by providing extra walk-in clinics.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Civil Service

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the figures for the years 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively (a) for the cost of the Civil Service and (b) the average cost for each civil servant; and if he will break down the average cost for each civil servant into pay, national insurance, superannuation, and other costs, such as office space, heating, lighting, car allowance, travel allowance, telephone, and so on.

Mr. MacGregor: As part of the introduction of the new running costs control system reported in the 1986 public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9702), there has been a reappraisal of the allocation of costs between the administrative and operational areas and some changes have been made. The reappraisal has been reflected in the running costs figures for all years in Cmnd. 9702. The adjustments were not, however, made to the level of detail requested by my hon. Friend, and I am not, therefore, able to provide the precise information requested.

Although there was a significant reduction in manpower numbers during the last five years, not all of the related costs (such as accommodation) can be expected to reduce at the same rate. The cost per head figures should be viewed in that light. However, the following figures are based on those published in Cmnd. 9702.

	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
	£ million outturn	£ million outturn	£ million outturn	£ million outturn	£ million outturn
Departmental running costs*	7,959	8,995	9,799	11,293	11,986

	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
Staff totals (average staff in post):
Civil Service (excluding Trading Funds)	665,300	648,400	630,600	611,100	596,000
Armed Forces†	58,000	58,000	58,000	58,000	58,000
Northern Ireland Civil Service	28,600	27,200	26,200	25,500	25,000
Costs per head (cash terms)	10,585	12,261	13,709	16,258	17,652

* Departmental running costs comprise pay costs, personnel overheads, accommodation costs, office services and other services. They do not include notional accruing pensions liability, pensions in payment or capital expenditure.

† Running costs coverage for 1986-87 has been revised to include the pay of armed forces personnel only where they are engaged in headquarters and support activities; 58,000 for 1986-87 (Cmnd. 9702). Figures for these activities are not available for the period covered by this table, so the 1986-87 figures of 58,000 has been used throughout.

Building Industry (VAT)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be (a) the revenue impact and (b) the employment impact of (i) removing value added tax on building improvements and alterations and (ii) reducing value added tax on all building repairs, improvements and alterations to 5 per cent.; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: It is estimated that the net revenue loss in a full year at 1986-87 prices of removing value added tax on building improvements and alterations would be of the order of £500 million; that of imposing value added tax on all building repairs, improvements and alterations at a rate of 5 per cent. would be about £450 million. It is not possible to estimate the effects on employment.

Wines and Spirits, Beer and Tobacco

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the duty payable on a hectolitre of 1037 deg original gravity beer in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available; by how much in cash percentage terms such duty increased in each of those years; and what is this percentage increase in real terms.

Mr. Brooke: The information is as follows:

	Post-Budget duty rate of 1037 OG (£ per hectolitre)	Percentage increase in cash terms	Percentage increase in real terms
1975	10·31	—	—
1976	11·94	15·8	− 0·6
1977	*13·14	10·0	− 5·0
1978	13·14	Nil	− 7·7
1979	13·14	Nil	−11·8
1980	16·10	22·5	3·9
1981	22·20	37·9	23·3
1982	25·16	13·3	4·3
1983	26·64	5·9	1·2
1984	29·60	11·1	5·8
1985	31·82	7·5	1·3

* This duty rate became effective from 1 January 1977 as a result of a 10 per cent. regulator surcharge on the 1976 Budget duty rate.

Mr. Parry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue was raised through excise duty on tobacco in each of the past six years.

Mr. Brooke: The information requested is as follows:

£ million

	Excise duty	VAT*
1979-80	2,584	450
1980-81	2,821	630
1981-82	3,420	720
1982-83	3,446	770
1983-84	3,806	810
1984-85	4,140	860

*Estimates based on consumers' expenditure data.

Mr. Parry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many petitions have been sent to him by hon. Members opposing any substantial increase in duty on tobacco products; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: About 200 such petitions have been forwarded by hon. Members.

Mr. Parry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how much revenue was raised through excise duty on wines and spirits in each of the past six years;

(2) how much revenue was raised through excise duty on beer in each of the past six years.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Member to table 3 on page 32 of the report of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise for the year ended 31 March 1985. There is a copy in the Library of the House.

Lump Sum Payments

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many appeals against decisions of inspectors of taxes to seek to assess lump sum payments made in consideration of taking up employment have been heard before (a) the general commissioners and (b) the special commissioners in the last 12 months; and in how many cases the commissioners have held the payments not to be assessable;

(2) if he will introduce legislation to amend the law relating to the assessment to income tax on lump sum payments made in consideration of taking up employment; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what clearances have been given by the Inland Revenue for schemes providing for payment of a lump sum contingent on a partner remaining within a particular partnership for a specified period that they will not seek to tax them as income; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Glynn Valley (Tree Felling)

Sir Richard Body asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report the text of the letter from the Treasury Solicitor to Mr. Michael Robertson, the owner of a designated woodland in the Glynn valley, regarding tree felling.

Mr. Jopling: I have been asked to reply.

The Treasury Solicitor's office has been unable to trace any letter to Mr. Michael Robertson on the subject of tree-felling. It did, however, write on 4 February 1986 to solicitors representing Messrs. C. M. Robertson (Developments) Ltd., of which Mr. Robertson is chairman, concerning the release of an area of woodland from the Forestry Commission's dedication scheme. The text of this letter is reproduced. The release of this woodland from dedication does not, however, imply permission to fell trees: any felling done is subject to the provisions of the felling regulations.

Dear Sirs

DEDICATED WOODLANDS (RELEASE)
PENGELLY ESTATE CORNWALL
C M ROBERTSON (DEVELOPMENTS) LIMITED

I have been advised by the Forestry Commission that your Clients own the freehold of 3·3 hectares of land coloured red on the plan enclosed in duplicate which is at present restricted by Deed of Forestry use. At request the Forestry Commissioners have agreed to release the land from this restriction.

Accordingly I should be grateful if you would provide me with a copy of the conveyance vesting this land in your Clients, including a copy or extract from the plan attached or referred to therein.

In the meantime I enclose a draft Deed of Release together with a copy thereof for your use please return one copy approved by you. I will then order plans and engross the Deed of Release, to be executed solely by the Commissioners.

Once the Deed has been sealed I will complete the matter, sending you the original Deed which you will note attracts no Stamp Duty. Thereafter the cancellation of the relevant Land Charge Entry will be dealt with and I will let you have a copy of the cancellation certificate for your records.

The terms agreed for the release were that the Commission should bear your Clients' reasonable legal costs in this matter. In submitting your invoice (which I suggest that you should so at completion) it would be helpful if you could show VAT separately, although it should be marked 'this is not a tax invoice'. The Owners should only be reimbursed for such of the VAT on your costs as the Owners cannot recover otherwise; so that I can tell how far your Clients should be reimbursed for VAT kindly return the enclosed VAT Certificate filled in on behalf of your Clients.

I look forward to hearing from you.

Yours faithfully
K. Dowling for the Treasury Solicitor

Exchange Rates

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 4 March, Official Report, column 95, what was the value of the dollar against the European currency unit on the date when the Council of Ministers agreed the financial guideline for agricultural market support expenditure in the current year, and what is the current value of the dollar against the European currency unit.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986]: The reference framework for 1986, including the financial guideline for agricultural market support expenditure was established by the Council of Ministers on 8 July 1985. The dollar/ECU exchange rate on that day was $1=1.347 ECU. On 7 March 1986, the exchange rate was $1=1.041 ECU. The 1986 EC budget was prepared using an assumption of an exchange rate of $1=1·20 ECU.

Mr. R. H. Hoyle

Mr. Steen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will instruct the enforcements office of the Inland Revenue to refrain from instituting proceedings against Mr. R. H. Hoyle of Golden Plam, Kingswear, relating to his alleged liability for his deceased brother's debts, until the outstanding matters raised in connection with this case in correspondence between the hon. Member for South Hams and the Financial Secretary, the right hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Moore) have been resolved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986]: I have written to my hon. Friend in reply to his recent letter about Mr. Hoyle's case.

Civil Service Contributory Pension

Mr. Soley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress he has made in his consideration of proposals for a Civil Service contributory pension system.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986]: The Government have no plans to place the principal Civil Service pension scheme on an overtly contributory basis in the foreseeable future.

WALES

Primary Schools (Anglesey)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the last time there was a report by Her Majesty's Inspectorate on every primary school on Anglesey.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is not readily available prior to 1978. Since then one formal inspection report, in respect of Moelfre county primary school, has been issued. Two reports on individual schools and the report of a survey of 22 schools in the Bodedern and Holyhead areas are currently being prepared. Over the same period all primary schools were visited as part of a survey of mathematics in primary schools in Anglesey and various schools will have been visited as part of more general surveys.

ENVIRONMENT

Rural Development Areas

63. Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the operation of rural development areas.

Mrs. Rumbold: Rural development areas are those areas to which the Development Commission gives priority and directs most of its resources. They were designated by the Developmet Commission using criteria laid down by my Department and came into operation in June 1984, replacing the former special investment areas.

Within rural development areas, county committees consisting of local authority representatives, rural community councils and other local agencies, draw up rural development programmes. These are made up of a range of economic and social development projects which may extend over several years, together with an outline strategy for five to 10 years ahead. These programmes help the commission to target its resources on projects which make the best contribution to rural development.

Agricultural Land

Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek to amend planning law so that, in the light of current production levels of certain kinds of agricultural produce, some agricultural land may be made available for other uses.

Mr. Tracey: There is no provision in the Town and Country Planning Acts which specifically prevents agricultural land being developed. Individual development proposals must be considered on their merits, having regard to all material considerations.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about research by bodies, other than the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive, into the safety of underground disposal of nuclear waste; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department commissions research on the long-term safety of underground disposal of nuclear waste and is advised by the independent United Kingdom Radioactive Waste Management Advisory committee on the adequacy of work undertaken by the nuclear industry and other bodies.

The United Kingdom also contributes to international research programmes of the Commission of the European Communities, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development/Nuclear Energy Agency and the International Atomic Energy Authority. The results of research funded by my Department are published.

An annual report on my Department's research is available from the Department of the Environment publication sales unit, Victoria road, South Ruislip 4HQ 0NZ.

Basildon Development Corporation

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the arrangements for winding up the Basildon development corporation.

Mr. Tracey: My right hon. Friend has considered the point made by my hon. Friend in the rates debate on 25 February at column 846. Nevertheless, he has concluded that it is right to proceed with our previously announced plan. An order under section 41 of the New Towns Act 1981 has been made today, the effect of which will be to transfer the property rights and liabilities of the corporation to the Commission for the New Towns on 1 April 1986, and to dissolve the corporation on 30 June 1986. The Commission for the New Towns will round off the programme of development in the town, and will in particular carry forward a number of important road schemes. The commission will pursue the question of transfer of the corporation's rented housing to the district council and, meanwhile the position of the corporation's tenants will be unaffected by the change from the corporation to the commission.

Home Improvement Grant Schemes

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities currently operate home improvement grant schemes.

Sir George Young: I would expect all local authorities to operate home improvement grant schemes. Under part VII of the Housing Act 1974, all authorities are required to approve mandatory grants provided certain qualifying conditions are met, and must therefore operate schemes for approving and giving such grants. Other grants under this legislation are discretionary, and local authorities may approve applications in such circumstances as they see fit.

Forestry

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the basis for the claim by the chairman of the Nature Conservancy Council in the latest annual report that, in forestry management in the north of Scotland, planting grant is often not obtained or even sought.

Mrs. Rumbold: The NCC is aware of only two cases of planting without grant, both in southern Scotland. The chairman has apologised to me for the inaccuracy. A correction has appeared in the NCC publication "Topical Issues" and will be repeated in the next annual report.

Religious Buildings

Mr. Cormack asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many (a) churches of the Church of England, (b) religious buildings belonging to other denominations and (c) redundant places of worship are currently listed as buildings of historic interest; and whether he will publish a list by county in the Official Report.

Mr. Tracey: I will write to the hon. Member.

Council House Sales

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of its stock of (a) council houses, and (b) council flats and maisonettes the Greater London council and each London borough has sold since April 1979.

Sir George Young: Separate numbers of houses and of flats owned by each authority are not available centrally.

For estimates of all completed sales and of sales of flats by each of the authorities, and all sales as a percentage of the total stock, I refer my hon. Friend to the table placed in the Library in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) on 19 December at column 259.

Hard-to-let Dwellings (Southampton)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many hard-to-let dwellings are owned by Southampton city council.

Sir George Young: Numbers of difficult-to-let dwellings in April 1985 were reported in each authority's housing investment programme return, which is available in the Library.

Local Government Expenditure

Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish, for each local authority in England (a) the percentage by which its expenditure is above or below its grant-related expenditure assessment in 1985-86, (b) the rank order of spending relative to grant-related expenditure in 1985-86 within each authority's class, (c) its percentage above or below its expenditure target in 1985-86, (d) the rank order of spending relative to target in 1985-86 within each authority's class, (e) the cash growth (as a percentage) in net expenditure between 1978-79 and 1985-86, (f) the rank order of percentage growth in net current expenditure between 1978-79 and 1985-86 within each authority's class, (g) the cash growth (as a percentage) in net current expenditure between 1981-82 and 1985-86 and (h) the rank order of percentage growth in net current expenditure between 1981-82 and 1985-86 within each authority's class.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have today placed in the Library tables which give the information requested.

Housing Renewal

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has reached a decision on proposals submitted to his urban housing renewal unit for schemes in the west midlands.

Sir George Young: Earlier today, on a visit to Coventry, I had the opportunity to visit the Hillfields estate. I was also able to announce my right hon. Friend's favourite response to a proposal for a scheme on the Hillfields estate which the city council has worked up in close consultation with my Department's urban housing renewal unit. We hope to reach agreement with the council on further schemes in due course.

The council has already introduced responsive locally based management arrangements on the estate, and is seeking to deliver a comprehensive housing service and to involve the residents in day-to-day decisions which affect their lives. The proposal agreed with the unit will be a major further step in the process of improving the quality of life on this rundown estate.

The Hillfields estate consists of 644 dwellings in ten tower blocks. Coventry city council has submitted a bid for resources from the unit's targeted housing investment programme allocation to replace defective heating systems, improve insulation, and provide extra lifts. I have agreed in principle to an additional HIP allocation of up to £779,000 for this programme in 1986-87. The estate will also benefit from a community refurbishment scheme, the aim of which is to enable unemployed people drawn mainly from the estate to work on improvements to the environment and communal areas. The scheme will provide up to 70 jobs, and will be funded by the Government's community programme, subject to the agreement of the Manpower Services Commission's area board, and my Department's urban programme. Resources of the order of £999,000 will be involved, including some £320,000 of urban programme funding, which I am pleased to approve in principle.

I warmly welcome the development of this package, and the close co-operation between the council and my Department's regional office and the staff and consultants of the urban housing renewal unit, which has made them possible.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Rape Victim (Photograph)

Mr. Corbett asked the Attorney-General, whether he will institute proceedings against the proprietor and editor of The Sun under section 4 of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976 in relation to the publication of a photograph of an alleged rape victim on 10 March.

The Attorney-General: The prohibitions contained in section 4(1) of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976 only apply to publications and broadcasts which take place after a person is accused of a rape offence. No person has yet been accused of the offence to which the report and photograph published in The Sun on 10 March refers and accordingly no offence is disclosed.

ENERGY

Hinckley Point (Incident)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to receive the Central Electricity Generating Board's board of inquiry report on the site incident at Hinckley Point power station on 29 November 1985; and if he will publish this.

Mr. Goodlad: I understand that the CEGB intends to publish the main conclusions of its inquiry shortly.

Bates Colliery

Mr. Lester asked the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had with the chairman of the National Coal Board about the redeployment of men from Bates colliery.

Mr. Peter Walker: I understand from the chairman of the National Coal Board that all men wishing to continue working in the industry will be able to transfer from Bates to other collieries in the north-east. Reports that deputies at Bates would not be offered an equivalent job on transfer are completely untrue.

I understand that almost half the NACODS members at the pit have expressed a preference for redundancy and the remaining 48 who prefer transfer to equivalent jobs have been given details of 85 jobs which are available at pits in the area.

PRIME MINISTER

Local Authority Services (Competition)

Mr. Chope asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to the reply of 27 February, Official Report, columns 668-9, when she expects a legislative opportunity to become available to implement the Government's intentions to extend compulsory competition and separate accounting to a wider range of local authority purposes; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I cannot anticipate the contents of future years' legislative programmes. However, the continuing low level of voluntary exposure of local authority services to competition reinforces this Government's determination to introduce appropriate legislation as soon as possible.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Clerks and Officers of the House

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the hon. Member for Berwick upon Tweed as representing the House of Commons Commission, how many (a) Clerks and (b) Officers of the House are in post; and how this compares with each of the past 30 years.

Mr. Beith: The table gives the information requested, as at five-yearly intervals. Clerks of the House are of course also Officers of the House and therefore the numbers in the second column include those in the first column.

	Number of Clerks	Number of Officers
1955	34	57
1960	34	58
1965	36	62
1970	45	83

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisons (Correspondence)

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether, in the light of the proceedings taking place in the European Commission of Human Rights regarding privileged correspondence between solicitors and their inmate clients, he will issue guidance to solicitors on how letters covered by rule 37A(1) should be marked so as to distinguish them from mail liable to be opened and read pursuant to rule 33;

(2) what steps he is taking to protect from examination correspondence between an inmate and his solicitor regarding an adjudication in respect of which the inmate has a right to consult a solicitor; and if he will make a statement of the basis of application of prison rule 37A(1) to such correspondence.

Mr. Mellor: Prison rule 37A(1) protects correspondence between a prisoner and his legal adviser in connection with legal proceedings to which the prisoner is party from being read or stopped, unless the governor has reason to suppose that it contains matter not relating to the proceedings. This protection is extended by standing order 5B 35 to correspondence between a prisoner and his legal adviser about an adjudication. Neither the prison rule nor the standing order prevents correspondence from being opened and examined—for example, to check for illicit material.

The examination of legal correspondence is the subject of a case under the European convention on human rights. My right hon. Friend will want to consider the app j 1-9arrangements for the examination of such correspondence, including the points raised in these questions, in the light of the outcome of that case.

Prisoners (Illness)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were diagnosed as suffering from terminal illness, while serving sentences in prisons in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, respectively, during each of the past five yars for which records are available; in each such year, how many of such prisoners were discharged by reason of their terminal illness; and how many of such persons who were released and not released, respectively, were young offenders.

Mr. Mellor: In 1985 in England and Wales eight people were released early from their sentences by exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy on the compassionate grounds that they were fatally ill. One was a young offender. In the preceding four years the figures were: 1980, seven (including one young offender released from borstal); 1981, four; 1982, three; 1983, five; and 1984, two (including one young offender). The other information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Information regarding other parts of the United Kingdom should be sought from my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department to whom reports of the diagnosis of terminally ill inmates in prisons and in young offenders' institutions, respectively, are made; and when and by whom they are made.

Mr. Mellor: Prison standing orders require the medical officer of an establishment to submit a report if he is of the opinion that the illness of any prisoner is likely to terminate fatally within a brief period; that the risk of further crime is past; that the prisoner is in a fit state to be moved; and that there is reason to believe that he has relatives or friends who will be able and willing to take care of him if he is released. The report is submitted to the director of prison medical services, with a copy to the criminal department, so that consideration may be given to the prisoner's early release.

Kevin Capenhurst

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date he was informed of the terminal illness of Kevin Capenhurst, an inmate of the Glen Parva young offenders' centre, and by whom.

Mr. Mellor: I understand that the case of Kevin Capenhurst was brought to the attention of the then Home Secretary on 20 August 1985.

Youth Custody Trainees

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects reconviction rates for youth custody trainees to become available.

Mr. Mellor: A special study is planned of the re-conviction rates of those given youth custody and results are expected to become available during 1987.

AMAC-1 Riot Control Vehicle

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Metropolitan Police have any intention of testing the AMAC-1 riot control vehicle.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that there are no present plans to do so.

Police (Disciplinary Proceedings)

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the number of cases in the last five years of which he is aware in which disciplinary proceedings against a serving police officer led, wholly or partially, to the deprivation of pension rights.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Power to require the forfeiture of pension rights is not available in disciplinary proceedings, but arises from the Police Pensions Regulations 1973, as amended. Outside the Metropolitan police, forfeiture of pension is at the discretion of the police authority, and there are no central records of the number of occasions on which the power has been used. However, except in cases of treason, or of offences under the Official Secrets Act involving a sentence of 10 years imprisonment or more, the police authority may not award forfeiture of pension unless a certificate has been issued by the Secretary of State to the effect that the offence committed in connection with the person's service as a member of a police force has either been gravely injurious to the interests of the state, or was liable to lead to serious loss of confidence in the public service. The number of such certificates issued in the past five years is as follows:

	Number
1981	—
1982	—
1983	2
1984	—
1985	1

In the Metropolitan police area the Secretary of State, as police authority, determines the extent as well as the principle of forfeiture. The number of awards of forfeiture of pension, in whole or in part, in the past five years is as follows:

	Number
1981	4
1982	1
1983	2
1984	—
1985	2

Prison Hospitals (Food Hygiene)

Mr. Richard Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the hospitals attached to prisons for which he is responsible; whether he will give the dates on which they were last inspected in respect of food hygiene; and whether the person responsible for any such inspection was a qualified environmental health officer.

Mr. Mellor: There are in-patient facilities at all prison establishments except Castington, Gringley, Morton Hall and Shrewsbury. Food is supplied from the prison kitchen. The serving and associated hygiene arrangements in the in-patient areas are inspected annually by catering managers qualified to undertake hygiene inspections in accordance with the requirements of the Food Hygiene (General) Regulations 1970. Random checks are also carried out by suitably qualified departmental safety officers and by a qualified environmental health officer of the Department of Health and Social Security. In addition, the prison medical officer carries out a twice-yearly inspection of all aspects of an establishment in the interests of the health and hygiene of the inmates and staff.

Information as to when each facility was last inspected is not held centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Computer-Aided Facial Recognition System

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the present state of development of the computer-aided facial recognition system (Wisard); for what purposes he envisages its use; whether he will publish the results of any feasibility study being conducted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Wisard is a commercially available system for recognising images and is not specifically a facial recognition system. The Home Office scientific research and development branch is, however, considering commissioning a feasibility study to assess whether it could be used for recognising faces. This proposal is still at an early stage and decisions have not yet been taken as to whether the results of any trials should be published.

Effra Parade, Brixton (Eviction)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a water cannon from the Greenwich holding centre was present at an eviction carried out by Metropolitan police officers in Effra parade, Brixton, on 26 March 1984; and whether police on that occasion were equipped with CS gas, plastic bullets, or firearms.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that none of the police officers deployed at the scene was equipped with CS gas, plastic baton rounds, or firearms. No water cannon were present.

Closed Circuit Television

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will indicate the nature and purpose of the closed circuit television equipment being purchased under a £500,000 contract with Philips Business Systems by the Metropolitan police; and where the equipment will be used.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the contract is for a computerised control system for use with the existing closed circuit television cameras which monitor traffic in London. The new control equipment will be sited in Metropolitan police operations rooms at New Scotland Yard and in the traffic control room at county hall.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to seek to reduce the time spent by remand prisoners awaiting trial.

Mr. Mellor: Field trials are in progress to prepare for statutory time limits on periods in custody awaiting trial; we are seeking to improve case management in the magistrates courts; and my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor has provided more resources for the Crown court.

Community Radio

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to announce to whom he has awarded the experimental community radio licences.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. Friend shall make an announcement when he has completed his consideration of the recommendations made by the advisory panel on community radio.

Mr. Mazooz Rashid

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the representations he has received from the hon. Member for Uxbridge concerning the entitlement of Mr. Mazooz Abdul Karim Rashid to remain in the United Kingdom; what investigations his Department have undertaken into this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: It is not normal practice to disclose information about a person's immigration status, nor would it be appropriate to publish my hon. Friend's representations in this case, but I shall reply to his letter of 16 January shortly.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken to seek to prevent the premature retirement of Metropolitan police officers; what effect such retirement has had upon effective and efficient policing; and, if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 19 February, c. 178]: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that he has set in hand a review to identify the most common reasons for premature retirement from the force. It is not possible to quantify their effect on police effectiveness.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the retirement of police officers from the Metropolitan police; what is the average length of service of a police officer of the rank of sergeant or below, and how many are serving with a length of service of (a) two years, (b) between two and three years (c) between three and four years (d) between four and five years (e) between five and 10 years (f) between 10 and 15 years (g) between 15 and 20 years (h) over 20 years.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 19 February, c. 178]: Under the Police Pensions Regulations 1973, an officer is entitled to receive an ordinary pension on retiring after 25 years' service and a full pension on retiring after 30 years' service. The maximum age of retirement for officers to the Metropolitan police up to and including the rank of chief superintendent is 55. The average length of service in the force of Metropolitan police officers currently serving in the rank of sergeant or constable is 10 years nine months. The table shows the percentage of sergeants and constables in the Metropolitan police who have the lengths of service in that force which are specified in the question.

*Length of service of constables and sergeants in the Metropolitan police

Length of service	Percentage of constables	Percentage of sergeants
Under two years	12·7	0·2
Two years and under three	6·0	0·4
Three years and under four	9·5	0·6
Four years and under five	9·9	1·5
Five years and under 10	26·3	28·0
10 years and under 15	11·9	23·4
15 years and under 21	8·9	22·5
20 years and over	14·8	23·4

* This table does not take account of service in other police forces.

Terrorism

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were detained under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1985 for periods in excess of 96 hours; how many persons so detained were charged with any offence; how many persons so detained were convicted of an offence; of which offences they were convicted; and how many persons were so convicted on the basis of evidence obtained by virtue of their detention in excess of 96 hours.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 25 February, c. 485]: In 1985, 64 persons were detained under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act for periods in excess of 96 hours. Of those, 38 persons were charged with an offence. No further action is to be taken in respect of three of those persons; one person has been convicted of an offence of withholding information under section 11 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act; and the other 34 are either standing trial or still awaiting trial. The person who was convicted of withholding information made a statement after he had been detained for more than 144 hours, but this was not used in court because he pleaded guilty to the charge.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Scientific Equipment

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science by how much he estimates the cost of scientific equipment has on average moved ahead of the current rate of inflation; and whether the allocation to the University Grants Committee and Advisory Board for Research Councils will be increased to cover the difference.

Mr. Walden: The Advisory Board for the Research Councils estimates that the increasing sophistication of scientific equipment and materials adds an average 10 per cent. a year to their cost over and above average inflation. The allocation of funds for distribution on the advice of the University Grants Committee and the Advisory Board for the Research Councils will be reviewed during the year as part of the annual public expenditure survey. I cannot yet say what the outcome will be. However, the Government's science budget has actually increased in real terms—by 6 per cent. between 1981-82 and 1985-86 measured against average inflation — and on present plans will broadly maintain its value to the end of the decade. The Government's expenditure plans also provide in addition to the £4 million a year for this purpose in the current year, for a further £30 million over the three years 1986-87 to 1988-89 to increase the amount available for the improvement of equipment in selected centres of research in the universities.

Universities (Funding)

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, how many university centres are being funded by £34 million provided for equipping them to the highest attainable standards; and if he will list the centres involved.

Mr. Walden: The following 19 research groups have so far been chosen to receive funds from the £34 million provided for the improvement of equipment in selected centres of research.

Research groups chosen for support in 1985-86

Professor A. R. Fersht, Chemistry, Imperial College
Professor A. R. Battersby, Organic Chemistry, Cambridge
Professor E. Ash, Electronic and Electrical Engineering, University College London
Sir Peter Hirsch, Metallurgy, Oxford
Professor T. L. Blundell, Birkbeck College, London
Professor A. Broers, Engineering, Cambridge
Professor R. Parsons, Electrochemistry, Southampton
Professor W. J. Brammar, Biochemistry, Leicester
Professor R. J. Donovan, Physical Chemistry, Edinburgh
Professors M. D. Lilly and P. Dunnill, Chemical and Biochemical Engineering, University College, London (interim grant)

Research groups which the University Grants Committee has undertaken to support in 1986-87

Professor M. D. Lilly and P. Dunnill, University College, London
Professor Sir David Phillips, Zoology, Oxford
Doctors Pepper, Willis and Ahmed, Cavendish Laboratory, Cambridge
Dr. Lowe, Biotechnology, Cambridge
Nuclear Structure Group, Physics, Liverpool
Professor P. Cohen, Biochemistry, Dundee
Professor A. W. Gambling, Electronics, Southampton
Professor G. K. Radda, Biochemistry, Oxford
Professor M. W. Roberts, Physical Chemistry, and Professor R. Williams, Physics, University College, Cardiff
Professor A. Keller, Physics, Bristol

The £34 million provision extends over the four financial years 1985-86 to 1988-89.

University Grants Committee

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what account was taken when deciding to reduce Government funding of the University Grants Committee by 2 per cent. per annum of the trends in outgoings in the scientific sector.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend takes all relevant factors into account in considering the future funding of the universities. The suggested reduction in funding of 2 per cent. a year is a planning hypothesis adopted not by my right hon. Friend but by the University Grants Committee to give it some flexibility in allocating resources between institutions and some room for manoeuvre in relation to future levels of inflation. The Government's expenditure plans for 1986-87 to 1988-89 provide for a reduction in funding for the universities of about 1 per cent. a year compared with expected inflation over the same period.

Women Teachers

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many women teachers were employed in secondary education in September 1965, September 1975 and September 1985; and what proportion of the overall number of teachers these figures represent.

Mr. Dunn: The information available on the numbers and percentages of women teachers in maintained secondary* education in England and Wales is as follows:

	Year	Numbers†	Per cent.‡
1965
	Full-time‖	59,000	41

	Year	Numbers†	Per cent.‡
	Part-time¶	13,743	81
1975
	Full-time‖	93,703	43
	Part-time¶	14,073	84
1984
	Full-time‖	110,366	46
	Part-time●	—	—

* Secondary education includes those teachers whose service is divided between primary and secondary sectors.
† Numbers are head counts for both full and part-time.
‡ Women as a percentage of men and women in the sector.
‖ Numbers are given at 31 March of each year.
¶ Numbers are given at 30 September of each year.
● Separate numbers of men and women are not available for September 1984 but women teachers are estimated to be 85 per cent of total.

Colleges and Academies of Music

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consultations he has had with representatives of colleges or academies of music concerning any change in the current functions of each institution; with what purpose; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: As I explained in my reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. St. John-Stevas) on 24 February at columns 430-431, I have met the heads of the music colleges as part of consultations with a number of leading figures in the musical world about the training of talented musicians. In the course of these discussions proposals from the Royal Academy of Music for its future academic development and other possible proposals have been raised.

University Teachers

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what he estimates the effect to be upon the quality of research and teaching in the United Kingdom university system of university teachers leaving their posts to teach in other countries.

Mr. Walden: Some movement of academic staff between nations is desirable. However, there is some evidence that there has recently been a disproportionate movement away from the United Kingdom of staff in certain disciplines. My right hon. Friend has expressed concern about this and is seeking further information about its extent and implications.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many university teachers in the United Kingdom have taken university teaching posts abroad in the past five years; and in what specialities.

Mr. Walden: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the comparative university salaries of a university lecturer with a Ph.D with seven years' experience, in the European Economic Community, the United States of America, Canada and Australia, respectively.

Mr. Walden: This information is not available centrally.

Civil Research

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to how many of the leading industrial states have progressively increased expenditure on civil research over the past five years; and what is the comparative position of the United Kingdom expressed in real terms.

Mr. Pattie: I have been asked to reply.

The available information from international sources relates to gross expenditure, civil and defence, on research and development and is given in the table below.

	Gross R and D expenditure at 1983 purchasing power parities ($ billion)	Percentage increase in gross R and D expenditure in real terms 1979 to 1983
United States	88·3	18
Japan	33·5	44

Mr. Holt asked the Paymaster General if he has any plans to increase the number of industrial tribunals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have no plans to increase the number of industrial tribunals.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Clay asked the Paymaster General if he will state the latest unemployment figures by ward and postal area for Sunderland.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Paymaster General if he will list the total number of new jobs which have become vacant or available in the Wolverhampton area during the last three months, and the specific areas of industry or commerce in which they have arisen.

Mr. Lang: The information is not available as requested. However, data are collected on the number of vacancies notified to jobcentres. The following table gives the numbers of vacancies notified to the Wolverhampton jobcentre between 8 November 1985 and 7 February 1986, analysed according to the 1980 standard industrial classification.

We estimate that nationally only about one third of all vacancies are notified to jobcentres.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Paymaster General how many people resident in the west midlands have withdrawn claims from his Department's offices during the last seven years without listing a new employment post when signing off.

Mr. Lang: My Department does not ask benefit claimants why they cease to sign as unemployed.

Fraud Investigations

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Paymaster General how many cases of legal proceedings have been instituted by fraud officers employed by his Department in the west midlands during the last seven years.

Mr. Lang: Information for the west midlands area is not separately available and no information is held for any period before February 1982. Between February 1982 and December 1985, the total number of legal proceedings instituted by my Department's midlands region against people suspected of making fraudulent claims to benefit was 1,999 but this figure does not distinguish between different parts of the region.

Bitter and Whisky (Prices)

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Paymaster General if he will list the average price used in compiling the retail price index of (a) a pint of ordinary bitter, 1037 original gravity, and (b) of a standard measure, one sixth of a gill, of a typical blended Scotch whisky in the years 1960, 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Lang: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Commissioners of Irish Lights

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the Commissioners of Irish Lights have registered with the Fair Employment Agency in respect of employment of staff in Northern Ireland; what information he has on their employment procedures; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: The Commissioners of Irish Lights have not signed the Fair Employment Agency's declaration of principle and intent and are not on the agency's register of equal opportunity employers. I have no information on the commissioners' employment procedures.

Schools (Staff Reductions)

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the schools in Northern Ireland which have been notified of teaching staff reductions in the school year 1986-87; how many posts will be lost at each of the schools; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: I shall write to my hon. Friend when the 1986-87 staffing allocations for Northern Ireland schools are finalised.

Students (Travel Grants)

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will review the current provision of travel grants to third level students from or in Northern Ireland particularly those from the western area; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: A review of the new arrangements was carried out in 1985. It revealed that the majority of students gained under the flat rate arrangements, and that a relatively small number lost. There are no plans to carry out a further review at present.

Enterprise Ulster and Action for Community Employment

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing how the Department of Economic Development calculated its figures for the cost per job in (a) Enterprise Ulster and (b) Action for Community Employment.

Dr. Boyson: The gross cost per job in Action for Community Employment and Enterprise Ulster is calculated on the expenditure incurred in each programme by the Department of Economic Development.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing the recommendations in respect of Enterprise Ulster made in the report "Intervention Measures in the Labour Market —An Efficiency Scrutiny", published in January 1985 and outlining what consideration he has given to the content of this report.

Dr. Boyson: The relevant information is contained in pages 4 to 8 of the report, a copy of which will be placed in the Library.

The board of Enterprise Ulster has already implemented some of the report's recommendations, and those dealing with the relationship between Enterprise Ulster and the Action for Community Employment scheme are being taken into consideration in the present review of Enterprise Ulster.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing the findings and recommendations in respect of Enterprise Ulster contained in the Deloitte, Haskins and Sells study published by the Department of Economic Development, "Report on the Effectiveness and Value for Money of Enterprise Ulster", and outlining what consideration he has given to the content of this report.

Dr. Boyson: I am making arrangements for copies of the report on this study to be placed in the Library.

The recommendations in the report are being taken into consideration in determining the outcome of the present review of Enterprise Ulster.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received about Enterprise Ulster from the Confederation of British Industry, the Northern Committee of Irish Confederation of Trades Unions, and the Manpower Council; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: So far I have only received representations from the Manpower Council and I will take into consideration their views and any others received from those organisations before making a decision on the future role of Enterprise Ulster.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he intends to make the order which would enable Enterprise Ulster to undertake new work after 1 April.

Dr. Boyson: I have no plans to legislate for Enterprise Ulster, pending the completion of the present review of the organisation. If the outcome of this review is a decision to extend the life of Enterprise Ulster, the order will be made as soon as possible.

TRANSPORT

Stansted Airport

Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has reached a decision on the new safeguarded area of land at Stansted airport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The White Paper on airports policy, Cmnd. 9542, made it clear that, in view of the decision that a second runway should not be constructed, the area at Stansted airport proposed for safeguarding against incompatible development was too large; and that a smaller area should be identified which might be required for construction of a second terminal if this proved to be justified at some time in the future. We have now agreed the extent of the land which is to be safeguarded for this purpose. This amounts to 327 hectares, of which the BAA already owns 60 per cent., compared with the 1,000 hectares for which safeguarding had originally been sought. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment proposes to issue shortly a direction to Uttlesford district council and Essex county council safeguarding the area of land which has been identified. A map showing the new safeguarded area can be viewed at the airport.

I have written to the BAA asking it to dispose of any landholdings which do not fall within the new safeguarded area, giving priority to farmland.

Rail Electrification

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received a request from Lancashire and Greater Manchester county councils for grant-aid under section 56 of the Transport Act 1968 towards electrification of the Manchester-Blackpool North railway line; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I considered such an application last year, but announced on 17 January my conclusion that electrification of the route from Manchester to Blackpool would not be cost-effective. Instead, British Rail proposes to introduce new diesel 'sprinter' units, and I am confident these will produce real improvements for passengers virtually equivalent to the benefits of electrification, at substantially less cost to taxpayers and ratepayers.

Electrification would have cost £13 million more net but the trains would have been only one minute faster over this route.

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total cost of the electrification of the Manchester-Blackpool North railway line.

Mr. David Mitchell: It is estimated that electrification of the Manchester-Blackpool line would cost £23 million. The alternative of diesel sprinter units providing an almost equivalent service leaves the taxpayers and ratepayers £13 million better off.

Trains (Punctuality)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has about the trend in the standard of train punctuality during the past 12 months.

Mr. David Mitchell: Information for the financial year 1985-86 is not yet available. I understand, however, from British Rail that punctuality so far has been slightly worse than in the preceding year. Taking the network as a whole, the board's own targets have been achieved for non-express trains, but not for express services.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the 1985 Transport Users' Consultative Committee report for north-east England, with particular reference to the trend in train punctuality in 1985 as compared with 1984.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have not received any such representations.

A1 (Lighting)

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to introduce lighting on the 46 miles of the A1 from its junction with the M18 to the Dishforth roundabout; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There are no plans at present to install lighting on the unlit lengths of A1 between M18 and Dishforth. I will keep the matter under review.

A1 (Safety Barriers)

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to provide centre safety barriers on the 31 miles of the A1 from its junction with the M18 to the Dishforth roundabout; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Safety barriers will be provided as part of the improvements planned for the A1 between Bramham crossroads and Dishforth.

The provision of barriers on the section between the M18 and Bramham crossroads will be kept under review.

Goods Vehicle Operator Licensing

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those who have made representations to his Department in response to the consultation announced on 25 July 1985 about goods vehicle operator licensing; and how many of these seek further strengthening of the environmental provisions.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Responses were received from the following bodies, 20 of which sought a strengthening of the environmental provisions:

Convention of Scottish Local Authorities
Peak District National Park
The Chiltern Society
The Wall's Meat Company Limited
Council on Tribunals
Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food
SPD Group
Nursling and Rownhams Parish Council
Council for the Protection of Rural England
Chobham Parish Council
British Gas
Freight Transport Association
The Chobham Society
Transport and General Workers Union
The National Farmers' Union
Cleanaway Limited
Road Haulage Association
Borough of Darlington
The Magistrates' Association
Dairy Trade Federation
Leicestershire County Council
Surrey County Council
The National Trust
Civic Trust
Association of Metropolitan Authorities
Food Manufacturers Federation Inc.
J D Atcherley Esq, on behalf of Chobham Residents Association of District Councils
Hales Containers Limited forwarded by National Association of Waste Disposal Contractors
The National Association of Local Councils
Co-operative Union Limited
Transport 2000
Chemical Industries Association Limited
British Retailers Association
Surrey Heath Borough Council
Exeter Civil Society
The Nottinghamshire Chamber of Commerce and Industry

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Transport what stage has been reached in the review of the working of the environmental provisions in goods vehicle operator licensing introduced in the Transport Act 1982, which was announced on 25 July 1985.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We are considering the views expressed about these provisions. A statement will be made in due course.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether the review of the working of the environmental provisions in goods vehicle operator licensing will take into account the judgment of the transport tribunal in the case of Surrey Heath borough council v. N.F. T. Distribution Ltd. (No. W.17) issued on 7 February; and whether, in the light of observations made by the transport tribunal, he plans to take steps to change the relevant primary and secondary legislation.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Important issues were raised by the transport tribunal in its judgment on this case and I shall be considering these in the course in the current review of the legislation.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will issue revised guidance to licensing authorities to reflect the judgment of the transport tribunal issued on 7 February in the case of Surrey Heath borough council v. N.F.T. Distribution Ltd.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: All the licensing authorities are aware of the transport tribunal judgment and I am sure they will have regard to it in dealing with similar cases.

N.F.T. Distribution Ltd.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the additonal conditions imposed by the transport tribunal on the licence held by N.F.T. Distribution Ltd. for authorised vehicles at its Chobham depot will take effect.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The decision of the transport tribunal takes effect from the date it was made, 5 February 1986.

Heathrow Airport

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was his reply to the Government of the United States of America in response to their recent representations about charges imposed on United States airlines for the use of Heathrow airport.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My officials met a delegation from the United States of America recently to discuss amongst other things the concerns expressed by their Government to Her Majesty's Government about the proposals for regulating airport charges set out in the Airports Bill. The delegation's main concern was that the Bill should provide adequate means for ensuring that the United Kingdom could fulfil its international obligations. My officials were able to explain how the measures in the Bill would do so: attention was drawn specifically to clause 27 of the Bill.

The United States Government also expressed a general concern about consultation between the British Airports Authority and its airlines, and about the level of charges at Heathrow airport. Although these are matters for the BAA and the airlines, information was provided to correct a number of misunderstandings about these two aspects: in particular about the nature and extent of the consultations which had been conducted and the considerably and progressively reduced level of charges now paid by the United States airlines and other long-haul airlines at Heathrow.

Accident Statistics

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people were killed, and how many injured, on the roads on Sunday 9 March.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Road accident reports are collated monthly by police forces before being checked and passed on magnetic tape to the Department of Transport. Full information covering all of Great Britain for March will not be available before August.

Northern Relief Route

Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is yet in a position to announce a decision on a preferred route for the northern relief route to relieve the M6 through the west midlands conurbation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cormack asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he can now announce his decision on the preferred route for the northern relief route for the west midlands conurbation.

Mr. Richard Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is yet in a position to announce a preferred route for the north Birmingham relief road; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am pleased to be able to announce that we have now chosen the route for this very important scheme. Alternative routes were taken to public consultation in 1984.

We have selected the green chasewater and yellow route options, with some local variations. The new road will predominantly follow the existing A5, A38 and A446. It will avoid creating a major new corridor through this sensitive part of the west midlands. It will be an attractive route for north-west/south-east through traffic, as well as helping to stimulate industry in southern Staffordshire.

The decision ends the uncertainty and brings closer the urgently needed relief to the M6. We now intend to press on with the new road as quickly as possible and expect to publish draft orders in early 1988.

British Airways

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a further statement about the privatisation of British Airways.

Mr. Ridley: The Government's aim remains to privatise British Airways as soon as possible.

The Government are currently engaged in important negotiations with the United States Government about United Kingdom—United States air services and the competition law that applies to them.

The north Atlantic market is of great importance to all the British airlines which serve it, accounting, for example, for about 23 per cent. of British Airways' total revenue and about 36 per cent. of British Caledonian's total revenue. It is most important for all British airlines, not least British Airways, that we secure an agreement with the United States Government which either enables them to compete on fair and equal terms for all the traffic between our two countries or, failing that, safeguards our vital interests. Without such an agreement the ability of our airlines to maintain or improve their competitive position would be severely undermined. I made our position perfectly clear during my recent visit to the United States. I am hopeful that it will be possible to negotiate acceptable arrangements before the present ones expire this summer, but before we proceed with the privatisation of British Airways we must clarify with the United States Government the air services arrangements which govern a large part of the company's business.

During my visit to the United States of America, I also set out our continuing concern to resolve the serious dispute between our two Governments with regard to the application of United States anti-trust laws to international civil aviation. My officials are in discussion with the United States Departments concerned, but no solution of the problems has yet been found. Until the United States authorities rectify the situation, it is for British Airways and other British airlines to decide how best to deal with the implications of United States anti-trust laws, subject only to such restrictions as Her Majesty's Government may consider it necessary to impose to protect the trading interests of the United Kingdom. The seriousness of the Government's concern is amply demonstrated by the fact that four years after the collapse of Laker Airways, anti-trust litigation arising from it has not yet been concluded. The company has consistently denied any liability in this litigation, which in the view of Her Majesty's Government should not have been brought.

In view of these factors I have decided, with great reluctance, that I can still not set a firm timetable for privatisation for the time being. I shall watch the situation closely, and proceed as soon as I judge the situation to be sufficiently clarified.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pesticides

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in which counties in England and Wales pesticide registration authorities require products for home and garden use to be packed in child-restraint packages and rodenticides to be used only in tamper-proof bait stations; and what proposals are presently being considered by his Department under the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 to control packaging on a nationwide basis.

Mr. Gummer: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Milk Quotas

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether progress is being made in permitting greater flexibility in the transfer and acquisition of milk quotas.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to the reply, 5 March, c. 198]: Since the milk quota system was first introduced, my right hon. Friend and I have been seeking greater flexibility to allow the industry to develop efficiently. After consulting the industry I have concluded that it would be helpful to make greater use of the existing provision in the Community rules under which purchasers of milk may reallocate quota. Within this context there is room for a limited arrangement under which producers may agree to reallocate quota between themselves for up to one quota year.

I am pleased to say that the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1986 which I am laying before the House include provision for such temporary reallocations to be registered by the purchasers of milk (the milk marketing boards). This facility will be available to producers for the new quota year starting on 1 April. This provision in the regulations is in addition to those which I announced in my reply of 6 March to my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker).

European Community (Food Sales)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of the total tonnage of food exported to third countries by the European Economic Commission was sent to East Europe, including the Soviet Union, in the most recent annual period for which figures are available; and what were the comparable percentages in each of the previous 10 years.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986, c. 358]: The information requested is set out for the main agricultural products in the table below. Percentages based on total tonnages may be unduly influenced by variations in the composition of exports to different destinations.

DEFENCE

Airbus

Mr. Normanton asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any study has been made of the feasibility of the joint Anglo-French exploitation of the Airbus airframe for use as an advanced airborne early warning and communications systems; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: No such study has been carried out by my Department.

SCOTLAND

Forestry Commission Sales

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the name, location, including county and map reference, size, purchaser, and price received, in respect of each of those forest estates sold to date by the Forestry Commission throughout Great Britain.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Youth Training

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many YTS places are currently taken up by Scottish local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Local authorities in Scotland at present have approval for 11,499 places under one year YTS, 9,143 of which are currently filled. Scottish local authorities have been major participants in and have contributed greatly to the success of one-year YTS. I am confident that the great majority will support the new two-year YTS which starts on 1 April 1986.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many individuals are currently receiving YTS training in Greenock and Port Glasgow; and how many of these trainees are females.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is not available in the precise form requested. However, in the local authority district of Inverclyde, which includes Greenock and Port Glasgow, some 813 individuals, of whom 368 are females, currently receive YTS training.

NHS (Management System)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the introduction to date in the National Health Service in Scotland of a general management system consequent upon the Griffiths report.

Mr. John MacKay: All 15 health boards have general managers in post and the Common Services Agency is recruiting one. I expect to receive in April the study which has been commissioned as the basis for deciding how general management can best be developed in units. The Scottish Home and Health Department will undertake consultations between May and mid-July on a draft circular on the development of unit general management. Work is continuing on further aspects of general management within the Scottish Health Service.

Non-advanced Further Education

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures have been taken to improve the quality of work-related non-advanced further education in Strathclyde and in Scotland as a whole.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Following the publication of the 16-plus action plan in 1983 a major reform of the framework of non-advanced further education and training for those over the age of 16 has led to the introduction throughout Scotland of new modular programmes of study leading to the award of the new SCOTVEC national certificate. Students (including adults wishing to retrain) can take programmes of modules which cover a whole range of vocational and personal skills. The new system enables students to identify the components they require for a chosen job or career, or to complement what they are learning at work, or to change direction and build on to existing qualifications without loss of credit. The modules can be adapted easily and quickly to meet the changing needs of industry and to take account of the impact of new technology. The system allows the development of closer links between education and training schemes, such as YTS, which are designed to prepare young people for working life; YTS trainees can receive the SCOTVEC national certificate for their "off-the-job" training. These recent important developments in Scotland will be enhanced by the introduction of the two-year YTS on 1 April which will include measures to further improve the quality of training of young people on and off the job. Through the Manpower Services Commission the Government also provide a wide range of adult training for employed and unemployed people. All of these measures are available in Strathclyde as elsewhere in Scotland. The Government's initiatives have helped place Scotland in the vanguard of further education and training progress.

Fisheries Protection Vessel

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to make an announcement concerning the placing of a contract for a new fisheries protection vessel.

Mr. John MacKay: Tenders have been invited for the construction of a fishery protection vessel to replace the FPV Norna which was commissioned in 1959. My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to announce the name of the successful tenderer in June.

Caledonian MacBrayne (New Passenger Ferry)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects Caledonian MacBrayne to announce the signing of a contract for the construction of a new passenger ferry.

Mr. Ancram: I am considering a proposal from Caledonian MacBrayne to build a further new passenger ferry. I hope to give it my decision soon, and, if it is favourable, the company will then be free to invite tenders for construction.

Strip Searches

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what rules, regulations and guidelines are applicable to the strip-searching and intimate scrutiny of female prisoners in Her Majesty's prisons in Scotland; if he will place copies of such documents in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: General provisions regarding the searching of prisoners in prisons in Scotland are contained in rule 14 of the Prison (Scotland) Rules 1952, copies of which are available in the Library.

Prison standing orders require strip-searches to be carried out as part of normal admission and discharge procedures; when a prisoner is being transferred to a segregation unit; during routine cell searches and special cell searches where there is reason to believe that contraband or weapons are being concealed; following "open" visits; and on leaving prison to attend a court hearing.

The procedures observed in Scottish penal establishments for the strip-searching of female prisoners by female staff are as follows:

(a) When a female is being strip-searched she is required, after removing her outer garments, to remove or drop to the waist the underclothing of the upper half of her body; she is then provided with a sheet to wrap around herself before removing the underclothing from the lower half of her body for examination. In the interest of decency great care is taken by the examining officer to ensure the minimum exposure of the body at any given time.

(b) In cases where a female prisoner is menstruating, a request is made to remove the sanitary protection for examination. Staff fully appreciate the embarrassment which is inherent in such a situation and therefore approach the task with great sensitivity. In practice, there has been no occasion within the recollection of staff when any refusal to meet such a request has been maintained. In the event of a refusal, the right to remove a sanitary towel, but not a tampon, is reserved to staff.

Labour Statistics

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the latest figures of long-term unemployment in the Greenock travel-to-work area.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is available in the House of Commons Library.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the current level of youth unemployment in Greenock and Port Glasgow.

Mr. Allan Stewart: On 9 January 1986, the latest date for which information is available, the total number of unemployed claimants under the age of 18 in the Greenock and Port Glasgow constituency was 701. In January 1985, the figure was 689.

Scottish Development Agency

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those projects in the Glasgow area which the Scottish Development Agency is to abandon because of funding difficulties.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986, c. 372]: Although a number of projects in Glasgow originally planned for 1986-87 are likely to be deferred to future years, the agency does not propose to abandon any projects.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

European Community (Internal Market)

8. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many of the further measures intended to open up the internal market within the Community listed in the 1986 presiding action programme have been adopted so far in 1986.

Mr. Alan Clark: Over 100 measures are identified in the programme as candidates for adoption in 1986, building on action last year to tackle barriers to intra-Community trade. Substantial progress has already been made on a number of them.

British Overseas Trade Board

10. Mr. Carttiss asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what detailed steps he takes to ensure that the British Overseas Trade Board's services are of particular relevance to smaller exporting businesses.

Mr. Alan Clark: Membership of the British Overseas Trade Board includes two successful small exporters who take a specific interest in the needs of smaller exporters. Many of the board's services are designed to be of particular relevance to smaller firms and about 75 per cent. of those making use of services provided by the board are small firms.

Manufacturing Investment

13. Mr. Norris asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry by how much manufacturing investment has risen since 1983.

Mr. Channon: The latest available estimate of investment in manufacturing including leased assets, in 1985 is £6·7 billion at 1980 prices. This represents an increase of nearly 21 per cent. as compared with the 1983 level of £5·6 billion.

Takeover Bids

20. Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether reciprocity is a factor taken into account by the Director General for Fair Trading and the chairman of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in considering takeover bids for United Kingdom firms by foreign nationals.

Mr. Howard: If they consider reciprocity to be relevant to the question whether the particular merger may be expected to operate against the public interest they may take it into account in advising the Secretary of State.

British Leyland

21. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to ensure that all employees at Land Rover, Leyland Trucks or any other part of British Leyland are consulted about their future before any irrevocable decisions are made.

Mr. Peter Morrison: As my right hon. Friend has told the House on a number of occasions, the BL management is making every effort to keep the work force informed. My right hon. Friend and I have met a number of delegations representing the work force in BL and have listened carefully to their views. I am very willing to meet further delegations whenever it wishes.

59. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met the board of British Leyland or its representatives to discuss Her Majesty's Government's plans for privatisation.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend and I met representatives of BL yesterday, 11 March, to discuss plans for privatisation.

Consumer Safety

22. Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what regulations he intends to introduce in the field of consumer safety over the next six months.

Mr. Howard: We intend to introduce consumer safety legislation over the next six months on child-resistant packaging and on radioactive products, to be followed shortly by legislation on electrical plugs and sockets, on surface temperatures of cookers and on the safety of gas cookers.

Automated Manufacturing Techniques

23. Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the level of support given by his Department for the introduction of automated manufacturing techniques in British industry.

Mr. Butcher: Since 1981 my Department has allocated £246 million to various measures aimed at helping British Industry with the introduction of advanced manufacturing technology.

Power Station Equipment

24. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on Government assistance in the realisation of export opportunities for manufacturers of power station equipment.

Mr. Alan Clark: All Government services for exporters are available to manufacturers of power station equipment, and the power section has made considerable use of these. In particular, more than a third of the aid and trade provision has been used to support projects of this kind. My Department continues to remain in touch with the manufacturers on their market objectives.

General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade

25. Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress on the proposed new general agreement on tariffs and trade round.

Mr. Alan Clark: As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow on 12 February, the contracting parties to GATT agreed unanimously on 28 November 1985 to set up a preparatory committee for a new round of multilateral trade negotiations. Ministers are expected to make a formal decision to launch the new negotiations at a special meeting planned for this September.

Alnwick and Amble

26. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make an official visit to the Alnwick and Amble area to discuss industrial development.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I have no plans at present to visit Alnwick and Amble. Of course, officials in my north-east regional office keep me in close touch and advise me on developments in the area.

Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd.

27. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the current position on the sale of Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced on 7 March, at column 596, that British Shipbuilders had been given consent for the sale of Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd. to the buy-out consortium.

Buy British

28. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to encourage more people to buy British manufactured goods.

Mr. Butcher: Ministers, including the Prime Minister, repeatedly point out the advantages of buying British goods where they are well designed, of good quality and competitively priced. Much of my Department's work helps British manufacturers meet these requirements and we very much welcome private sector initiatives with similar objectives.

Design Commitment Conference

29. Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is in a position to report the outcome of the design commitment conference held at Lancaster House on 28 January.

Mr. Butcher: The conference brought together the top managers of leading United Kingdom companies with experience of exploiting design in their businesses. Its aim was to generate a multiplier effect by persuading them to hold design seminars for their principal suppliers and so help spread good design practice more widely. I am delighted that, at the latest count, 62 companies have said they would do so or consider doing so.

Services (International Trade)

30. Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress is being made in the liberalisation of international trade in services.

Mr. Howard: Work is proceeding in GATT to set up a new round of multilateral trade negotiations. It is essential that trade in services, among other relevant topics, should be included in the round, and we are working to that end. I hope also for progress towards the completion of the European Community's internal market in services as well as in goods.

Steel Industry

31. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will next meet the chairman of the British Steel Corporation to discuss the prospects for the steel industry.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend will be meeting the chairman-designate, Mr. Scholey, on 17 March.

Share Ownership

32. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is considering any further steps to encourage management-employee buy-outs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: On 7 March my right hon. Friend announced that he had agreed to the sale of Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Limited to the VSEL Employee Consortium plc. I welcome management-employee bids where they offer the prospect of an appropriate method of privatisation.

Strategic Defence Initiative

33. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment his Department has made of the implications for industry generally of the non-military spin-off arising from strategic defence initiative-related research work in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The aim of the Department of Trade and Industry is to encourage maximum civil benefits from defence research and development. This applies equally to strategic defence initiative research and defence research. Although strategic defence research has long-term defence applications as its primary objective, some activities are also likely to lead to civil end uses. It is too early to predict the specific results of the research.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

34. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has received representations from the Scottish Knitwear Council on Her Majesty's Government's position on the renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Yes, I have received the views of the Scottish Knitwear Council through the British Textile Confederation with which, along with other interested organisations, the Department has kept in regular touch and whom I met last week. Taking full account of the advice received and of the views expressed in debate in this House, I was able to play a full part in the Foreign Affairs Council debates on the MFA on 17-18 February and 10-11 March which agreed a mandate on the basis of which the European Commission will negotiate the renewal of the MFA in the GATT textiles committee.

The mandate should enable the Commission to negotiate terms for the renewal of the arrangement and for bilateral agreements with individual suppliers, which will enable effective protection to Britain's textile and clothing industries to continue to be provided while giving some element of more liberal treatment for the poorer countries and those with open markets. The mandate also provides for some limited liberalisation in respect of children's clothes. The Community has agreed that it will be ready to deal, during the next round of multilateral negotiations, with the question of the return of textiles trade to normal GATT rules over the longer term.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he collects, in the context of the multi-fibre arrangement, concerning the comparative average annual incomes for industrial workers in (a) Brazil, (b) Turkey, (c) India, (d) Pakistan, (e) Korea, (f) Hong Kong, (g) Taiwan and (h) the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

52. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received on an extension of the multi-fibre arrangement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I continue to receive a large number of representations concerning the renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement. I met representatives of the industries, the trade unions, consumers and retailers last week to discuss their views.

Technological Innovation

35. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of his Department's budget is spent in promoting technological innovations.

Mr. Butcher: In 1985-86 my Department expects to spend 28 per cent. of its budget in promoting technological innovations.

Telecommunications Industry

36. Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the effect on competition within the telecommunications industry of the privatisation of British Telecom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The success of the changes in 1984 in promoting competition in the telecommunications industry is under constant appraisal. In this, my right hon. Friend has the assistance of the Director General of Telecommunications, with whom he shares a duty under the Telecommunications Act 1984 to maintain and promote competition. The privatisation of British Telecom, with its spur to greater efficiency and better services, has brought many benefits.

English Estates

37. Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the current level of investment by English Estates in advance factory units in England and the south-west region; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend will be making an early statement about English Estates' investment programme as soon as the Estimates have been submitted to Parliament, and will be discussing with them where it actually plans to spend the money in the 1986-87 financial year.

Design Advisory Service Consultancy Scheme

38. Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many companies have successfully applied for funding under the Department's design advisory service consultancy scheme.

Mr. Butcher: 2,263 initial projects and 598 follow-up projects had been completed as at 31 December 1985.

Fuel and Raw Material Costs

39. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry by what percentage industry's fuel and raw material costs have fallen during the past year.

Mr. Butcher: The price index for materials and fuel purchased by manufacturing industry in February was 9·5 per cent. lower than a year earlier.

Information Technology

40. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the United Kingdom's share of the world information technology market in (a) 1970 and (b) 1983.

Mr. Butcher: Available information would suggest that the United Kingdom share of OECD exports of information technology goods (that is data processing equipment, office machinery, electronic components, electronic consumer goods, telecommunication equipment and electronic capital goods) in 1983 was 7 per cent. Information for 1970 is not available. The United Kingdom share in 1978 was 8 per cent.

Soviet Union

41. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on Britain's trade with the Soviet Union.

Mr. Alan Clark: This is the first year of the new Soviet five-year plan which puts great emphasis on the refurbishment of industry and on productivity, quality and the efficient use of energy. British firms have much to offer in these areas and I hope that they will take advantage of this. I initialled the long-term programme for economic and industrial co-operation with the Soviet Deputy Foreign Trade Minister Mr. Manzhulo, on 6 February, and the opportunities were listed therein. A copy of the programme is in the Library.

Research and Development

42. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much he estimates, in percentage terms, research and development in defence industry related areas will change in cash terms between the financial years 1983-84 and 1987-88.

Mr. Butcher: Most of industry is relevant to defence, but there are no clear definitions of defence industry relatd areas. In cash terms, intramural and extramural expenditure by the Department of Trade and Industry on aircraft, electronics, microwave standards and space is forecast to increase by 4 per cent. between 1983-84 and 1987-88. Expenditure on space will be with the British National Space Centre at Farnborough, which incorporates parts of the Royal Aircraft Establishment. Details of Ministry of Defence expenditure may be found in the "Annual Review of Government-Funded R. & D, 1985".

Romania

43. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what specific measures to increase Anglo-Romanian trade have been taken since the meeting of 14 February with the Romanian ambassador.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Department of Trade and Industry maintains a close and regular dialogue with the Romanians with a view to increasing bilateral trade. I had a useful discussion with the Romanian ambassador on 14 February.

Manufacturing Industry (North-West Region)

44. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he proposes any new initiatives to encourage the growth of manufacturing industries in the north-west.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Many parts of the north-west Region are designated as assisted areas and thus stand to benefit from my Department's various measures of assistance. We shall of course be monitoring the new arrangements introduced late in 1984 to ensure that the maximum benefit is gained from the money put in.

Inmos

45. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he proposes to take to retain Inmos in British ownership.

Mr. Butcher: It is for Thorn EMI, which control Inmos, to determine the future ownership of the company.

European Council (Consumer Affairs)

46. Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress he hopes to make in the field of consumer affairs in forthcoming European Council meetings.

Mr. Howard: Progress will, as always, depend on the degree of agreement reached between member states. However, we intend to pursue the goal of a true internal market with all the benefits that it will bring to consumers, and hope that this can be achieved without the need for complex harmonisation of law.

In particular, we wish to ensure that the European Commission's communication "A new Impetus for Consumer Protection" will be fully discussed at forthcoming Councils of Ministers, including one of Consumer Affairs Ministers which we intend to hold during the United Kingdom presidency, and that as a result a realistic programme of action can be agreed. The most important parts of the Commission's communication are the proposals to ensure consumers' physical safety and the plans to stress that the consumer interest should be taken into account in all Community policies. The Government welcome this change in emphasis towards greater weight being given to the consumer interest in matters such as agriculture and transport and see this as an important step towards making the Community work to the benefit of all consumers.

Balance of Trade

47. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the latest balance of trade.

Mr. Alan Clark: The current account was in surplus in 1985 by £3·0 billion. In January there was a near record suplus of £1·1 billion.

57. Mr. Ashby asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on Britain's current trading performance.

Mr. Butcher: The current account was in surplus in 1985 by £3·0 billion. In January there was a near record surplus of £1·1 billion.

Film Industry

48. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on present Government policy on the film industry.

Mr. Butcher: The Government remain of the view that the measures outlined in the White Paper, "Film Policy" (Cmnd. 9319) will provide a framework for the commercial film industry within which it can develop and prosper.

Exports (Soft Loans)

49. Mr. Wolfson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement of progress on implementing the soft-loans package for exporters announced in 1986.

Mr. Alan Clark: I should like to announce that, together with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development, we have decided to offer to the Chinese Government an increase in the soft loan facility for China from £100 million to £300 million. This support will be provided from the aid programme under the aid and trade provision; it will help the development of China and lead to many projects, orders and jobs won for the United Kingdom. Agreement in principle has been reached with the Chinese authorities on a number of potentially suitable projects. Elsewhere, several projects which may be suitable for soft loan support are under active consideration.

Ford Motor Company

50. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has on the proportion of its United Kingdom profits in each of the last five years which the Ford Motor Company has reinvested in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The figures for 1985 are not yet available but Ford's 1984 annual report shows that for each of the years 1980-84, Ford's United Kingdom investment, or expenditure on tangible assets exceeded its United Kingdom profits after tax. The figures are:

£ million

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Profit (loss) after tax	204	165	192	(103)	37
Expenditure on tangible assets	249	197	277	199	174

Car Industry

51. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will meet the general council of the Trades Union Congress to discuss the future of British car manufacturing industry.

Mr. Butcher: My right hon. Friend has no immediate plans to do so, but of course is always prepared to have such a meeting.

Land Rover (Sale)

53. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many representations he has received regarding the possible sale of Land Rover to General Motors.

Mr. Peter Morrison: To date I have received some 625 representations about the possible sale of Land Rover to General Motors.

Domestic Telephones

54. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has received any representations about the liberalisation of domestic telephone wiring; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received several representations on this subject. The Director General of Telecommunications is currently considering the liberalisation of telephone extension wiring connected to direct exchange lines. I am awaiting his advice.

Insurance Industry

55. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress of his Department's discussions with the insurance industry concerning changes to the statement of practice of the industry.

Mr. Channon: I refer the hon. and learned Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) on 21 February, at columns 358-59.

Computer Graduates

56. Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the current short-fall from the requirements of the industry in computer graduates, for the latest convenient date.

Mr. Butcher: Steps have been taken to increase the supply of graduates with information technology related skills in response to industry's concerns about shortages. It is always difficult to provide precise estimates of skills shortages because of problems of definition. However, my Department has instigated a study by the Institute of Manpower Studies on the expected patterns of supply and demand for IT manpower to 1990, the result of which should be available in a few months.

Manufactured Goods

58. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the value of manufactured goods exported in the last year for which figures are available; and what was the comparable figure in 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: In 1985 exports of manufactures amounted to £52·3 billion compared with £31·0 billion in 1979.

Competition Policy

60. Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied with the operation of the present machinery for competition policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The present machinery has served its purpose well, but we naturally keep all our policies under constant review.

BSC (Industry) Ltd.

61. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the activities of BSC (Industry) Ltd.

Mr. Peter Morrison: BSC (Industry) Ltd. is continuing to perform the role for which it was set up in 1975; that is helping to create jobs in steel closure areas. It operates in 18 "Opportunity Areas", and has helped more than 2,000 businesses since 1975. These businesses are committed to creating some 50,000 jobs by March 1987, of which about 30,000 are already in place. BSC (Industry) Ltd. became financially self-sufficient in April 1984.

Board of Trade

62. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent meetings have been held at the Board of Trade under his presidency; who attended; what was the form of proceedings; and what business was transacted.

Mr. Alan Clark: There have been no meetings of the Board of Trade under the presidency of the present Secretary of State.

Copyright Law

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is yet in a position to say when he expects to publish the White Paper on reform of the law of copyright; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: The Government expect to publish in April a White Paper dealing with copyright law reform and other intellectual property issues.

Auditors

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many responses he has received to his consultative document, "The Auditor's Role in the Financial Services Sector"; and when he expects to announce his decision on whether or not provisions relating to auditors should be added to the Financial Services Bill.

Mr. Howard: Twenty nine responses to the consultative document have been received. I hope to be able to announce my conclusions shortly.

Cancer Screening

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he plans to make available to companies and businesses assistance grants to enable them to establish cancer screening facilities on their premises.

Mr. Butcher: I have no such plans.

China

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on trading prospects with China.

Mr. Alan Clark: I should like to announce that, together with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development, we have decided to offer to the Chinese Government an increase in the soft loan facility for China from £100 million to £300 million. This support will be provided from the aid programme under the aid and trade provision; it will help the development of China and lead to many projects, orders and jobs won for the United Kingdom.

NATIONAL FINANCE

European Monetary System

64. Mr. Alton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from British industry about the possible implications for industry of a decision by Her Majesty's Government to joint the European monetary system.

Mr. Ian Stewart: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations from industry about joining the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS.

Value Added Tax

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many firms have exceeded the time limit for making value added tax returns; and how many prosecutions have occurred in the past year.

Mr. Brooke: Of the 1·5 million or so traders who are registered for VAT about 75 per cent. usually fail to furnish returns by the due date. In the 1985 calendar year, 4,360 traders, representing some of the most serious cases, were prosecuted for such failures.

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to permit small firms to make value added tax returns within two months instead on one month currently permitted.

Mr. Brooke: No. The one-month period for payment was set only after extensive consultation with trade and other interests. It allows an average of two and a half months' credit before the tax charge to customers has to be paid to Customs and Excise. However, as part of the Government's deregulation initiative, Customs and Excise is reviewing its policy towards small businesses more generally, including the practicability of any other special arrangements for them.

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of total value added tax remains uncalculated due to default.

Mr. Brooke: None. All value added tax due is assessed by calculations performed by Customs and Excise in default of returns by registered traders.

Contingency Reserve

Mr. Higgins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will analyse the way in which the Government's contingency reserve was allocated between Departments in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Lawson: Since 1984-85 all variations between departmental spending and plans have been met from the reserve. Thus the divergence between departments' plans and outturn is a measure of the way in which the reserve has been allocated. The figures are in the table.

For years before 1984-85 the contingency reserve was used only for discretionary increases in expenditure above departmental plans; it thus excluded most overruns on demand-led and local authority current spending, which in some periods have been substantial. Because of the different nature of the reserve, it is not possible to produce figures showing a departmental breakdown of sums charged to the contingency reserve which would be comparable with the figures in the table provided and relevant to the way the reserve in now managed.

Visual Display Units

Mr. Soley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many visual display units are in use by his Department and the Inland Revenue; and how many of these are Tempest-shielded.

Mr. Moore: There are 483 visual display units in use in Her Majesty's Treasury and some 7,300 in the Inland Revenue. Information regarding the numbers of these which are Tempest-shielded is classified.

EC (Budget Contributions)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the abatement of the United Kingdom contribution to the European Economic Community is taken into account in the European Economic Community budget process; if the 1986 abatement will require a supplementary budget; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The United Kingdom statement is taken into account in the EEC budgetary process in a number of stages. First, the Commission calculates, from its information about shares of VAT contributions and about receipts from the budget, the size of the abatement according to the formula laid down in the own resources decision of 7 May 1985. This sum is then deducted from the contributions the United Kingdom would have to make at the uniform rate of VAT needed to finance the budget, and a new, reduced VAT rate for the United Kingdom is calculated and entered in the budget. Once the budget has been adopted, our VAT payments are made at the abated rate. The agreed detailed methodology for the budget procedure on our abatement is set out in the EC document COM(85) 36 which was discussed during proceedings in Committee on the European Communities (Finance) Act —[Official Report, 1 July 1985; Vol. 82, c.78-116.]

This agreed methodology makes provision for two possible corrections of the abatement by means of amending budgets. The first of these is interim and optional, the second final and compulsory. The corrections are designed to take account of more complete information on our VAT and receipts shares from the Community budget. As my predecessor reported to the House on 30 October 1985, the Council of Ministers has already invited the Commission to introduce an amending budget during 1986 in order to uprate the abatement in respect of 1985 and has undertaken to take the necessary decisions on the basis of the Commission's proposal.—[Official Report, 30 October 1985; Vol. 84, c.501-2.] The preliminary assessment of the abatement in respect of 1986 will be included in the main 1987 budget.

Enterprise Allowance

Mr. David Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why it is the practice of the Inland Revenue to treat the enterprise allowance as trading income rather than as grant.

Mr. Lawson: The enterprise allowance is intended to supplement the takings of a business during its first year and its tax treatment as a trading receipt follows from this. A grant paid for a similar purpose would be taxable in the same way.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Fallon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, for the latest years now available, identifiable public expenditure by programme in England, Northern Ireland, Scotland, Wales and the United Kingdom expressed (a) in cash terms, (b) as a percentage of United Kingdom total identifiable public expenditure, (c) as an amount per capita and (d) as an amount per capita expressed as a percentage of the United Kingdom amount per capita.

Mr. MacGregor: Tables 1 to 5 show figures of identifiable public expenditure according to main function in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. These are the only available figures comparing public expenditure by function in the four countries of the United Kingdom. The analysis covers 1980-81 to 1984-85, the only period for which data are available on a consistent basis. The term "identifiable expenditure" refers to expenditure that can be identified from official records as having been incurred in a particular country.

Table 6 compares, for the latest year, 1984-85 expenditure in the Scottish, Welsh and Northern Ireland programmes with the total identifiable expenditure in the respective countries. It shows that identifiable expenditure has a wider coverage than expenditure within the responsibility of the Secretaries of State in the case of Scotland or Wales, and in the case of Northern Ireland it has a slightly wider coverage than the Northern Ireland programme in the public expenditure survey. This table also shows total unidentifiable expenditure by programme for 1984-85.

Unidentifiable expenditure includes expenditure on defence, overseas aid and other overseas services which are deemed to have been incurred on behalf of the United Kingdom as a whole. Also included in this category are Government net lending to, and the market and overseas borrowing of, the public corporations (including the nationalised industries) due to the difficulty in allocating this expenditure between countries. Total identifiable expenditure accounts for approximately 80 per cent. of total public expenditure on programmes.

Identifiable expenditure has been defined as expenditure that can be allocated to England, Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland. In some cases it can be allocated to Great Britain (rather than England, Scotland or Wales) and in these circumstances it is appropriate to compare Northern Ireland allocated expenditure with that allocated to Great Britain. Tables 7a and 7b provide this analysis over the five-year period.

The extent to which expenditure can be identified may vary from year to year and between countries. The coverage of particular programmes can also vary between countries—for example, in Northern Ireland expenditure on arts and libraries is contained in the education programme.

The following tables use the terms and definitions of the public expenditure White Paper "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1986-87 to 1988-89" (Cmnd. 9702). The figures have therefore been classified to the definitions of public expenditure used in Cmnd. 9702 and may differ slightly from those published previously. The territorial analysis exercise was carried out before the figures in Cmnd. 9702 became available. The latter incorporates later information and shows total expected outturn for 1984-85 to be £129·6 billion, that is some £200 million higher than the planning total shown in table 6. The additional sum will be included in the next territorial analysis.

This reply does not cover matters falling within the treaties establishing the European Coal and Steel Community and the European Atomic Energy Community, since the Single European Act affects them only in respect of the establishment of a court of first instance.

EC (Security Policy)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what provision is being made for the development of a European Economic Community security policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Security matters do not come within the scope of the European Communities. The member states do co-operate on the political and economic aspects of security in the framework of European political co-operation. Their co-operation in this field will be covered by article 6 of the new treaty provisions on European political co-operation in the sphere of foreign policy which form part of the Single European Act. I refer the hon. Member to the evidence on European political co-operation which my right hon. and learned Friend gave the Foreign Affairs Committee of this House on 11 December, which has now been published.

Uganda

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions his Department is now having with the Government of Uganda as to the payment of compensaton to former residents of Uganda who lost their assets under the Amin régime.

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker) raised the claims of British nationals with President Museveni during her visit to Uganda last month.

Messrs. Paul Hopler and Clarence Robinson

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has cleared the visit to the United Kingdom of Mr. Paul Hopler or Mr. Clarence Robinson of the Pentagon; and if he will say what the purpose of Mr. Hopler's and Mr. Robinson's visit is.

Mr. Eggar: We have no knowledge of a joint visit by Mr. Hopler and Mr. Robinson. Mr. Robinson did visit the United Kingdom, but, as my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement pointed out to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on 6 March, at column 266, no official approach was made, and no United Kingdom companies were visited. United States officials do not require prior clearance from my right hon. and learned Friend before visiting the United Kingdom, although we would naturally expect them to notify us before making investigations here.

Visual Display Units

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the approximate number of visual display units in use by his Department; and how many are Tempest-shielded.

Mr. Eggar: There are approximately 820 visual display units in use at home and overseas. Information regarding the numbers of these which are Tempest-shielded is classified.

Albania

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which member states of the European Economic Community have diplomatic relations with Albania; and when the Council of Ministers last discussed European Economic Community relations with Albania.

Mr. Renton: The following member states of the European Community have diplomatic relations with Albania: France, Italy, Belgium, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Denmark, Greece and Portugal.

There are no central records on discussions by the Council of Ministers of the European Community's relations with Albania. This topic has not been discussed within the last two years.

Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many meetings of the Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold have taken place since January 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: There have been three meetings of the commission since January 1984. These took place on 23 May 1984, 12 March 1985 and 29 May 1985.

Corfu Channel (Vessel Losses)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list any changes in the amounts and value of gold held under the control of the Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold since May 1984.

Mr. Renton: There has been no change since May 1984 in the amount of gold held by the Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold. The value of that gold has changed only in accordance with changes in world prices.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current value of the 1949 International Court of Justice award of damagess in respect of the loss of two British naval vessels in the Corfu channel in 1946; and if the survivors or the families of those who lost their lives in the incident will receive any of the award when it is made.

Mr. Renton: The amount awarded by the International Court of Justice was £843,947. Compensation has already been given to those injured or bereaved in the incident in the form of disability and widow's pensions. They are unlikely to benefit further when the award is made.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will report on the outcome of the Foreign Affairs Council held in Brussels on 10 and 11 March.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. and learned Friend and I, together with my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade, attended the Foreign Affairs Council in Brussels on 10 and 11 March.

The Commission reported to the Council on its recent discussions with the United States Administration on current trade disputes, notably United States complaints about the effects on their trade of Spanish and Portuguese accession.

The Council agreed a declaration on the Community's trade and economic relations with Japan, stressing the need to achieve tangible results as soon as possible in order to relieve the increasing strain which Japan's overall surplus is placing on the multilateral trade and payments system. A copy of the declaration has been placed in the Library of the House.

The Council reviewed the work now in hand for the progressive restoration of normal relations between Turkey and the Community. The Council confirmed its intention that there should be a meeting of the Association Council at ministerial level in early autumn.

The Council agreed a mandate for the forthcoming negotiations for renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement. My hon. Friend the Minister for Trade will make a separate statement on this.

The Council decided to refer to Health Ministers the recommendations of the group of national cancer experts set up following the Luxembourg European Council.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Pensioner Households

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pensioner households lost housing benefit as a result of the changes which came into effect in November 1985; and how many of these lost (a) up to £1 a week, (b) between £1 and £2 a week, (c) between £2 and £3 a week and (d) more than £3 a week.

Mr. Major: I assume my hon. Friend has in mind the changes other than the normal uprating changes. The estimated number of pensioners whose housing benefit was less than it would otherwise have been because of the increase in the rate rebate taper above the needs allowance, offset where appropriate by the real improvement in the dependent child addition to the needs allowance, in November 1985 is as follows:

Thousands, Great Britain

Reduction	Pensioners affected
Up to £1	1,310
£1 to £2	140
£2 to £3	10
Over £3	*
TOTAL	1,460

Cervical Cancer

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of women suffering, or having suffered, from cervical cancer during the period from 1965 to the present day were at the time under 35 years of age as shown in the annual returns.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys handles statistics of registrations of newly diagnosed cancers; this provides the nearest available information on the numbers of women suffering from cervical cancer. The table shows the latest available data on registrations of malignant neoplasms of cervix uteri, and of carcinoma-in-situ of cervix uteri.

Earnings Rule

Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Social Services at what level of income the earnings rule has operated in respect of retirement pensions in each year from 1978-79 to date.

Mr. Major: The weekly limits above which retirement pension is affected are shown in the table. The limit in force since November 1985 will remain unchanged when benefits are next uprated in July 1986.

Local Dental Committees

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) pursuant to the answer of 20 December, Official Report, column 420, what criteria have to be fulfilled before he is satisfied that a local dental committee is representative of the dentists within that area; and how many local dental committees have failed to be so recognised by him in each of the last 10 years;

(2) if he will make regulations to provide that all local dental committees hold elections every four years and that they use postal ballots through an independent agency such as the family practitioner committee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: A local dental committee is considered to be representative of the general dental practitioners in the locality of the family practitioner committee where its members are elected and the electorate comprises all dentists on the dental list of the committee concerned. No local dental committee has failed to be recognised in the last ten years.

The questions of frequency of elections and whether voting should take place at a general meeting or by post are for local decision. The returning officer however is invariably the administrator of the family practitioner committee. I have no plans to alter the present arrangements.

NHS (Private Patients)

Mr. Lewis Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to raise the National Health Service charges for private patients and overseas visitors in the next financial year.

Mr. Hayhoe: From 1 April 1986, the charges payable by private patients and overseas visitors for accommodation and services at Health Service hospitals will go up to amounts that reflect the total costs that it is estimated will be incurred in the next 12 months. For outpatients, the average increase is 16 per cent., reflecting cost increases and a reassessment of the component for overheads in these charges and follows increases of 13 per cent. and 4 per cent. in 1985 and 1984. The average increase for inpatients is 4 per cent. following increases of 9 per cent. and 14 per cent. in the previous two years.

The basis for all these charges is under review and account will be taken of the report of a study of private patient charges by the National Audit Office expected later this year, and the recommendations of a health service Rayner scrutiny on the marketing of private patient facilities which will be reporting shortly.

Charges for overseas visitors will be increased in line with charges to private patients through regulations which were laid yesterday. Details of charges for private patients are given in the table.

Research

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the social security research currently being undertaken by or on behalf of his Department; what are his priorities for future social security research; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

London Postgraduate Hospitals (Inpatient Costs)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish figures to show the costs per inpatient week for each of the London postgraduate hospitals in each of the last three financial years.

Mr. Whitney: The table shows the weekly cost of an inpatient for each of the hospitals concerned:

Terrence Higgins Trust

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any proposals to increase the grant which his Department has allocated to the Terrence Higgins trust; and what factors he took into account when deciding to allocate the present amount of grant to the Terrence Higgins trust.

Mr. Whitney: No decision has been reached on the level of the grant for next year.

Residential Care (Working Party)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the replies to the right hon. Member for Stoke on Trent, South on 24 February, Official Report, column 469, if he will appoint representatives of relevant voluntary organisations to the joint working party on residential care; and if he will make a further statement.

Mr. Newton: Since the working party will be primarily concerned with the balance between central and local public spending on residential care, we have agreed with the local authority associations that membership should be limited to central and local government representatives. However, we and the local authority associations recognise the important implications of this work for the voluntary sector and have agreed that it should be given a prominent role in the working party's consultations.

Chlamydia Trachomatis

Mr. Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has on the scale and rate of increase of non-specific genital infection caused by the organism chlamydia trachomatis in the United Kingdom over the past five years;

(2) what information he has on the incidence of pelvic infection and sterility caused by long-term failure to diagnose chlamydial infection in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hayhoe: The information collected centrally does not identify this information, but there are indications that the incidence of chlamydia has risen in the last few years. My Department is funding research studies on the incidence and prevalence of this infection in defined groups of women at university college hospital, and on the epidemiology of chlamydial infections at the social medicine and health services research unit at the united medical school of Guys and St. Thomas' hospitals.

Mr. Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what funds have been made available within the National Health Service to public health or National Health Service laboratories to control the spread of chlamydia trachomatis by making generally available diagnostic kits for this purpose.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am aware that testing for chlamydia trachomatis is becoming more widely available now that diagnostic tests have been developed. But as it is for health authorities and the public health laboratory service to determine the allocation of their resources in the light of their particular needs and priorities no specific National Health Service funds have been allotted for such tests.

Immunodiagnostic Testing

Mr. Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he will describe the costing of immunodiagnostic testing in the National Health Service, public health and blood transfusion service laboratories, with particular reference to the recent criticism of current procedures;

(2) what information he has on the rate at which immunodiagnostic testing employing radioactive isotopes is being replaced by commercially available products which do not require such isotopes.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not available centrally, and I am not aware of the criticism to which my hon. Friend refers.

Diagnostic Procedures

Mr. Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he will make a statement on the availability of suitable non-isotopic diagnostic procedures within the National Health Service in the light of the general trend away from radioactive testing in Europe and North America;

(2) what funds have been made available to enable the National Health Service to purchase diagnostic kits which will facilitate the withdrawal from radioisotopic testing and its replacement by modern diagnostic procedures which create no radiation or disposal hazards.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is for health authorities themselves to make decisions about the deployment of resources and the purchase of the most suitable products to meet their needs. I am not aware of any evidence to suggest that these decisions are not well informed and based on developments in practice.

Blood

Mr. Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) why the blood products laboratory at Elstree continues to manufacture and supply radioisotopic immune assays for hepatitis B surface antigen to the blood transfusion service, despite the availability of non-isotopic kits similar to those now being used for the testing of acquired immune deficiency syndrome;

(2) whether he is satisfied that funds currently being used within the National Health Service for the manufacture of radioisotopic immune-assays for hepatitis B could not be more effectively employed in areas not adequately covered by the private biotechnology sector.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Department's circular, HC(83)3, states that health authorities should not engage in the manufacture of such products unless there is no suitable commercial alternative, or unless it is significantly cheaper to do so. I have no evidence that this policy is not being generally observed. The policy applies to the Central Blood Laboratories Authority which is responsible for the blood products laboratory at Elstree. Regional transfusion centres are free to use whatever products they consider are safe, suitable and cost-effective whether manufactured by a health authority or the private sector.

Abortions

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of legal abortions, broken down between National Health Service and non-National Health Service, to women usually resident in the area of the Southampton and South-West Hampshire district health authority in each of the last five years.

Mr. Hayhoe: The table shows the numbers of notifications of abortions carried out under the Abortion Act 1967 to women usually resident in the Southampton and South-West Hampshire health area for 1980 to 1985 by category of premises.

The figures for 1985 are provisional as they exclude late notifications for 1985 received after the end of January 1986.

Departmental Office (Southampton)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the approximate turnover in 1985 of staff in the grades of clerical assistant and clerical officer in the Southampton social security office.

Mr. Major: Following is the information for the year ender 31 December 1985.

Turnover is defined as those staff who leave the Department (including those who retire), change offices within the Department or are promoted within an office. The number of staff who leave the Department (including those who retire) is lower. Both sets of figures are set out in the table:

		Per cent.
Clerical Assistant
Total turnover	25	54·3
Total leavers	10	21·7
Clerical Officer
Total turnover	26·5	21·5
Total leavers	19·5	15·9

Students (Benefits)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to receive the report of the social security advisory committee on proposed changes to the eligibility of students for housing and other benefits.

Mr. Newton: I understand that the committee hopes to submit its report within a few weeks.

Southampton and South-West Hampshire Health Authority

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the income received by the Southampton and South-West Hampshire health authority in each of the last 10 years from the disposal of land and buildings.

Mr. Whitney: The information required was not collected centrally in respect of district health authorities until 1982-83. The figures since then are as follows:

1982-83	22,292
1983-84	152,605
1984-85	Nil

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the annual expenditure per person on primary health care in the Southampton and South-West Hampshire district health authority in each of the last five years.

Mr. Hayhoe: Following are the figures requested:

Expenditure per head of population on Primary Health Care Southampton and South-West Hampshire Health Authority*

1980-81	61
1981-82	69
1982-83	78
1983-84	82

* Current expenditure on community health services plus net expenditure on family practitioner services. The latter expenditure cannot strictly be attributed to particular districts but has been included (pro-rata to population) from the annual accounts of the family practitioner committee which accounts for it.

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the capital projects completed within the Southampton and South-West Hampshire district health authority area in each of the last eight years and their costs.

Mr. Whitney: Information is held centrally only on schemes each costing at least £2 million and is as follows:

(1) Southampton general phase 5 maternity — building and engineering cost £5·4 million — building completion 1979.

(2) Southampton general phase 5, west ward block — building and engineering cost £6·4 million — building completion 1981.

(3) Royal south Hants phase 2 mental illness unit — building and engineering cost £2·8 million — building completion 1978.

For information on schemes costing less than £2 million I suggest that my hon. Friend contacts the chairman of the Wessex regional health authority.

Hospital Patients (Hampshire)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was, at the most recent date for which records are available, the number of patients registered on waiting lists for each category of inpatient and outpatient treatment at hospitals in (a) the Southampton and South-West Hampshire health authority, and (b) the Portsmouth and South-East Hampshire health authority.

Mr. Whitney: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. Friend all the information he seeks. Some of it is not collected centrally. My hon. Friend may wish to write to the chairmen of the district health authorities in which he is interested for information on outpatient waiting lists. The available information is given in the table.

Accident Victims (Treatment)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will set out the income of the National Health Service in England and Wales derived directly from patients and indirectly from insurance companies, in respect of treatment to accident victims in each of the last five years.

Mr. Whitney: Payments under sections 154 and 155 of the Road Traffic Act 1972 are due from the owners or users of vehicles, or their insurers, and not from patients as such. The annual accounts of health authorities record income from this source in total only. The totals for England and Wales are:

1980-81	2,887
1981-82	4,434
1982-83	6,210
1983-84	7,224
1984-85	7,631

Southampton General Hospital

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the facilities to be provided in phase 5 of the development of the west ward, Southampton general hospital, Southampton together with their cost and the expected date of completion.

Mr. Whitney: Information held centrally records that the building of Southampton general hospital—phase 5 west ward block was completed in December 1981. The building and engineering cost was £6·4 million. It contains 425 beds, a professorial suite, rehabilitation services, staff changing facilities, a chapel, and university teaching accommodation.

Royal South Hampshire Hospital

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the facilities to be provided in phase 3 of the development of the royal south Hampshire hospital, Southampton together with their cost and the expected date of completion.

Mr. Whitney: Information held centrally records that the Royal south Hampshire hospital phase 3 will provide 35 oncology beds, 40 bed day unit with three theatres, endoscopy suite, 10 X-ray rooms, pharmacy, pathology department, ear nose and throat services, and catering facilities. The building and engineering cost is £11 million. The estimated date for completion is October 1986, following which a period of commissioning will take place before the hospital opens.

Health Authorities (Accommodation)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what are the criteria he applies to applications for district health authorities for (a) the disposal and (b) the retention of residential accommodation for their employees;

(2) if he will publish in the Official Report that part of his circular on accommodation for health service staff which defines the types of accommodation which should be sold or retained by health authorities.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have sent the hon. Member a copy of the policy circular he refers to and have placed one in the Library. Under its provisions, health authorities have discretion to decide on the level of accommodation to provide for those training to become doctors, nurses or members of the profession allied to medicine. The circular makes it clear that in general authorities should not provide accommodation for other staff but that exceptional cases should be considered.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consultation he had and what response he received from the Royal College of Nursing concerning his proposal for health authorities to cease to provide accommodation for second and third year student nurses and other personnel.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Rayner scrutiny on residential accommodation recommended that in future accommodation for nurses in training should be limited to first year students. As a result of comments on the scrutiny, including those of the Royal College of Nursing, it was decided that authorities should continue to have discretion to provide accommodation for any professional trainees.

Mr. Nigel Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the names of the district health authorities which have given notice to any of their employees to quit accommodation owned by them, consequent on his circular on surplus accommodation, together with the number of units of accommodation in each case.

Mr. Hayhoe: So far only plans for the health authorities listed in the table have beeen approved. The number of units of accommodation currently provided, and the number to be provided from 1 January 1988, are shown. It is not known whether any of these authorities has yet given any members of staff notice to quit; I will let the hon. Member have a further reply when I have this information. Under present policy, anyone no longer to be provided with accommodation must be given at least a year to make alternative arrangements.

	Current units	Units from 1 January 1988
Chester	435	272
Crewe	425	261
Halton	122	74
Macclesfield	306	233
Warrington	330	217
Southport	308	208
South Sefton	531	268

Retirement Benefit (Widows)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, whether underpayments of graduated retirement benefit made to some women widowed during the period April 1975 to October 1977 have now been corrected.

Mr. Newton: The records of over 31,000 women widowed during the period April 1975 to October 1977 have now been examined and arrears of graduated retirement benefit due have been paid to some 10,000 of them. Action is continuing in a small number of residual cases where further information is required.

Industrial Injuries Scheme

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Sevices whether he has received the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council's response to the consultation paper on the industrial injuries scheme issued by his Department in December 1985.

Mr. Newton: We are considering the council's response. I have placed copies in the Library.

Housing Benefit

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the proportion of council house tenants in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland who receive housing benefit.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 6 March 1986, c. 244]: Information is not available in the precise form requested. However, estimates based on local authority subsidy claims indicate that the proportion of council tenants (including new town and Scottish Special Housing Association tenants) who receive rate rebates is: 51 per cent. in Inverclyde, 67 per cent. in Strathclyde and 61 per cent. in Scotland.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the proportion of domestic ratepayers in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland who receive housing benefit.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 6 March 1986, c. 244]: Information is not available in the precise form requested. However, we estimate that the number of rate rebate recipients, based on local and regional authority subsidy claims, as a proportion of the number of domestic ratepayers, is about 47 per cent. in Strathclyde and about 38 per cent. for Scotland as a whole. Rate rebates for Inverclude are the responsiblity for the regional rating authority whose subsidy claim does not separately identify rate rebate recipients in that district. I regret therefore that an estimate for Inverclyde is not available centrally.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the latest estimates of the number of households receiving housing benefit in Great Britain, showing (a) the division between standard and certificated cases, (b) the division between home owners, council tenants and others, (c) the division between pensioner households, families with children and others, (d) the number receiving rent rebates or allowances only, (e) the number receiving both a rent rebate or allowance and a rate rebate and (f) the number receiving a rate rebate only.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 5 December 1986, c. 342]: The latest available estimates, based on inquiry information which relates to the autumn of 1984, are given in the following table. Estimates for later dates are currently available only on the basis of a computer simulation model using family expenditure survey data.

Housing benefit: autumn 1984

Great Britain, thousands

	Standard housing benefit(1)	Certificated housing benefit(2)	All housing benefit
All households	3,810	3,210	7,020
—home owners	1,580	690	2,270
—council tenants	1,760	1,970	3,730
—others	470	550	1,020
—pensioners	2,570	1,460	4,030
—families with children	730	920	1,650
—others	510	830	1,340
—rent rebate/allowance and rate rebate only	1,700	2,400	4,100
—rent rebate/allowance only	200	100	300
—rate rebate only	1,900	700	2,600

Notes:

(1) Estimates of standard housing benefit recipients are mainly derived from the DHSS September 1984 Standard Enquiry of local authorities.

(2) Estimates of certificated housing benefit recipients are derived from the August 1984 supplementary benefit Quarterly Enquiry. These estimates relate to those certificated to receive housing benefit. A very small proportion may not actually receive housing benefit because of the effect of deductions for non-dependent members of the household but reliable information is not available to quantify this.

(3) Estimates of the numbers receiving rent and rate help, rent help only and rate help only are subject to considerable proportionate error and are therefore rounded to the nearest 100,000. The remaining estimates are rounded to the nearest 10,000.

Supplementary Benefit

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what will be the (a) gross and (b) net savings to the social security budget of abolishing the rent addition paid to 21 to 24-year-olds from 28 July 1986 in (i) 1986-87, (ii) 1987-88 and (iii) in a full year after the policy affects all claimants at current benefit rates assuming no other major changes in social security.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986, c. 376]: The information available on non-householder additions in supplementary benefit is based on 1983 returns. On these figures the change in arrangements would suggest a gross saving of about £8 million to £9 million in 1986-87 and £26 million in 1987-88. We do not collect information centrally on non-dependant deductions from housing benefit, but our estimates suggest that the increase in the number of households where a deduction would not be made in future might reduce the gross saving by somewhere around a tenth. 1987-88 is the only full year before the wider social security changes which are planned, and since the change applies to new claims it will not affect all claimants. However, we estimate that abolition of the addition in all cases would result in an annual gross saving of about £35 million.

TRANSPORT

A46 Leicester Bypass

Sir Adam Butler asked the Secretary of State for Transport when a public inquiry will be held into whether or not to proceed with the A46 Leicester western bypass.

Mr. Ridley: We hope to publish the draft line and side roads orders for the A46 Leicester western bypass towards the end of this year. If required, a public inquiry would be held about nine months later.

Local Authorities (Grants)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all specific type grants paid by his Department to local authorities, showing the size of each grant, which were hypothecated to any individual service or services or where local authorities had to bid for specific grants.

Mr. Ridley: The table shows the specific grants for which my Department is responsible.

Grant	Rate per cent.	1985-86 £ million	Purpose	Bidding	Hypothecation
Transport Supplementary Grant	50	160	To support highways capital spending on roads of more than local importance	Through Transport Policies and Programme submissions	Block grant, not hypothecated to particular schemes
Transport Facilities Grant	50	*6	To support new or improved public transport facilities costing over £5 million	By specific submission containing financial and economic appraisal	Specific grant
Basic Service Grant	30	*1·5	To support industrial estate access-roads in assisted areas	By specific submission	Specific grant

A38 Ripley Bypass

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information was available about the stability of the route chosen for the A38 Ripley bypass at the time of the public inquiry.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department was aware of the geological conditions which existed on the line of the Ripley bypass at the time of the public inquiry in 1972.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much the repairs to the recent slippage on the A38 Ripley bypass are likely to cost: and how long they are expected to take.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Temporary remedial measures are now being carried out to stabilise the cutting where the recent slippage has occurred. The northbound inside lane of A38 was closed on 5 March 1986 as a safety measure. The temporary repairs are expected to be completed by 26 March when two-lane traffic flow will be restored.

I am awaiting a report from our agents, Derbyshire county council, on the permanent remedial works required. Preliminary estimates indicate a total cost, including temporary works, of around £100,000. The permanent measures will take approximately eight weeks and may be delayed until completion of carriageway strengthening works on A38. These are currently scheduled to be carried out between the middle of May and end of July.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he intends to hold a public inquiry into the recent slippage on the A38 Ripley bypass.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is not considered necessary to hold a public inquiry into the recent slippage.

Seat Belts

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on regulations relating to the wearing of seat belts or restraining harnesses by children aged under 14 years in (a) Europe and (b) the United States of America.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall write to my hon. Friend shortly.

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he has any plans to seek to amend the age conditions governing the compulsory wearing of a seat belt in the front seat of a motor vehicle;

(2) if he has any plans to seek to amend the age conditions governing the compulsory use by a child in the front seat of a motor vehicle of child restraining harnesses.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. I do want to encourage motorists to fit and use child restraints in the rear of their cars. We shall shortly be launching national press advertising and a revision of the leaflet "Protect Your Child in the Car". I shall make the leaflet widely available.

The safest place for young children to travel is in the rear seat of the car, wearing approved child restraints appropriate to their age.

If restraints are not fitted in the rear, it is safer for children to wear an adult belt in the front with a booster cushion as necessary to ensure the belt fits.

Motor Vehicles (Children)

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many children aged under 14 years were killed or seriously injured in a motor vehicle in the last three full years for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Child* motor vehicle occupants, killed or seriously injured, 1982-1984:

Great Britain

	1982	1983	1984
Killed	70	76	74
Seriously injured	1,321	1,142	1,295

* aged between 0 and 13, inclusive.

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has had suggesting the introduction of legislation concerning the restraining of children in the back of motor vehicles.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The regulations made in January will require the fitting of rear seat belts or child restraints to all new cars manufactured from this October. A small number of individuals and road safety organisations have suggested that we should also introduce legislation requiring the wearing of rear belts or restraints. Compulsory fitting will make it easier for parents to follow the safe course and use restraints in the back of the car. It is sensible and often easy to fit rear seat belts or child restraints to older cars.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Water Cannon, Greenwich

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Metropolitan police have requested the removal of the two water cannon sited at the Riverway centre in Greenwich; what scientific tests are proposed on the use of these water cannon; and whether live animals will be used in these tests.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Metropolitan police are working with the Home Office in evaluating the two prototype water cannon with the aim of establishing whether water cannon have a role to play in the policing of serious public disorder. In this connection, the two prototypes have been temporarily moved from Greenwich. There are no plans for tests involving live animals.

Metropolitan Police (Baton Rounds)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the results of the Metropolitan police review of equipment and procedures for the firing of baton rounds.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner's review is not yet complete. The principles governing the use of plastic baton rounds were set out most recently in the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) on 25 November, at column 391.

Police Air Support

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the review of policy air support to be completed; what are its terms of reference; which persons sit on the review body; in what capacities; and from whom they are taking evidence.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that the safety aspects of police air support are under review by the Civil Aviation Authority with the assistance of officials of the Department and representatives of the police service. Detailed questions about the review should be addressed to the authority.

Court House, Basildon

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the provision of a new court house in Basildon.

Mr. Giles Shaw: There is nothing to add to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend on 23 January, at column 268. Further action on the scheme still rests with Essex county council.

Beat Police Officers (County Durham)

Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will call for a report from the chief constable of Durham concerning the number of home beat police officers who are currently operating in County Durham; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The term "home beat officer" is not used by Durham constabulary. I understand from the chief constable that there are currently 35 sergeants and 270 constables in his force whose responsibilities equate to those of home beat officers.

Independent Broadcasting Authority

Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the chairman of the Independent Broadcasting Authority.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary last met the chairman of the Independent Broadcasting Authority on 16 January.

Local Authorities (Grants)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all specific type grants paid by his Department to local authorities, showing the size of each grant, which were hypothecated to any individual service or services, or where local authorities had to bid for specific grants.

Mr. Hurd: Details of the Home Office specific grants are as follows, together with the amounts provided for England and Wales in Class IX, votes 6 and 7 of the Supply Estimates 1985-86 and the Supply Estimates 1985-86, Supplementary Estimates:

	£ million
Police	1,399·724
Magistrates' courts	128·606
Probation	129·539
Commonwealth immigrants (section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966)	89·424
Civil Defence	11·989

Grants under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966 are paid towards the salaries of staff in a range of local authority services, following applications to the Home Office. The other grants are paid on the basis of expenditure on the services identified.

Cigarette Sales (Children)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions were brought in during the years 1980 to 1984 against retailers under section 7 of the Children and Young Persons Act for selling cigarettes to children.

Mr. Mellor: The information available to me, which may be incomplete, is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables, Volume 1" (table S1.1(A) of the issue for 1984 under offence classification 144 and corresponding tables for earlier years).

Smoking (Fire Accidents)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total number of injuries and fatalities in fires caused by smoking for the most recent year for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor: The readily available information is of accidental fires, attended by local authority fire brigades, for which the source of ignition was reported as cigarettes, lighters, cigars or other similar smokers' materials, other than matches. In 1984 there were 262 fatal and 1,874 non-fatal casualties from such fires in the United Kingdom.

Sunday Trading

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what additional funds have been set aside contingently for local authorities during the financial year 1986-87 to provide such services as may be required for Sundays and weekends in the event that the Shops Bill [Lords] is passed;

(2) what estimates have been supplied to him by local authorities of the additional costs likely to arise to them in providing municipal services if the Shops Bill [Lords] is enacted; and what information he has as to the nature of additional services that will be required.

Mr. Waddington: Consultations with local authority associations have shown that no reasonable estimates of any additional services or expenditure can be prepared until the extent of additional opening of shops can be assessed. The Auld committee concluded that any increase in the cost of public services would be trivial; subsequently, one association, the Association of County Councils, has suggested that something over £1 million could be required and another, the Association of District Councils, predicts no marked effect on the rate burden.

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations the Government have received from hon. and right hon. Members writing on behalf of their constituents concerning the proposed legislation on Sunday trading.

Mr. Waddington: Since the publication of the Shops Bill the Government has received 974 representations from right hon. and hon. Members concerning the proposed legislation on Sunday trading.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what have been the average fines for convictions for Sunday trading in each of the last three years.

Mr. Waddington: The information readily available indicates only the number of persons fined within specified monetary limits. I shall write to the hon. Member when I have the information he seeks.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the costs to local authorities in each of the last three years arising from enforcement of the Shops Act.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that I have no information on the costs to local authorities of enforcing the Shops Act.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on the current state of compliance with Sunday trading legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: In 1984, the last year for which information is available, there were 743 convictions for illegal trading on a Sunday. It is clear, however, that this does not reflect the extent to which the law is being disregarded. The Auld committee concluded (Cmnd. 9376, paragraph 25) that the existing law was not generally enforced by local authorities and was being widely disregarded by shopkeepers all over the country.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from shops as to the anticipated changes in turnover and profit expected to arise from unrestricted Sunday trading and as to the likely additional costs to them, particularly wages costs.

Mr. Waddington: Since the Shops Bill [Lords] was published the Govenment have received 44 representations from retailers about possible changes in turnover, profits and costs. Some expect increased turnover and profits, others fear increased costs.

Data Protection Act 1984

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received from businesses about alleged difficulties in understanding the requirements of the Data Protection Act 1984; and whether he will take steps to simplify registration requirements.

Mr. Waddington: Since the beginning of this year we have received six letters about alleged problems created by the Data Protection Act 1984. The Data Protection Registrar, who is responsible for the arrangements for registration under the Act, is keeping the procedures under review and will be looking to simplify the procedures if that proves possible from experience of the working of the Act.

Small Businesses (Fire Precautions)

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has had from businesses, especially small businesses, in response to his consultation on the Fire Precautions Act 1971; and how these representations are being taken into account.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Home Office has received responses from 19 business organisations (including three specifically representing small businesses) and from 13 companies, commenting on various aspects of the proposals made in the consultative document on the review of the Fire Precautions Act 1971. All the responses are being carefully considered and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and I will be reporting the outcome of the consultative exercise in a further document to be published later in the spring.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what restrictions have been imposed upon working overtime of Metropolitan police officers in each year since 1979, what effect such restrictions have had upon the amount of crime being investigated or not investigated, categorised in the most convenient form; and what effect such restrictions have upon individual police officer's enquiries and upon policing as a whole.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 19 February 1986, c. 178]: It has been the policy of successive Commissioners of Police of the Metropolis that overtime should be authorised only when it is operationally necessary. In May 1985, as part of a package of planned expenditure reductions, the force's overtime budget for 1985-86 was reduced from £58 million to £49 million. It is not possible to quantify the effect which this measure has had on the investigation of crime or on policing as a whole in London. The strength of the Metropolitan police increased between 31 May and 31 January by 171 officers.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Foreign Language Teaching

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students currently studying at colleges of education have a formal qualification in the Japanese or Chinese language.

Mr. Walden: This information is not collected centrally.

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any proposals to seek to increase the awareness of teaching Japanese, Chinese and other Asian languages in primary and secondary schools.

Mr. Chris Patten: The range of languages on offer in schools is an important issue and will be among those matters addressed in a forthcoming statement of policy on foreign languages in the school curriculum.

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) how many pupils have qualified with an O-level or A-level GCE in Japanese or Chinese in each of the past 10 years;

(2) how many pupils in 1985 entered the General Certificate of Educaion O-level and A-level examinations in Japanese or Chinese.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information requested is not available centrally for school pupils. The table gives, for the most recent five years for which information is available, the numbers of graded results in Chinese and Japanese at GCE O and A-level achieved by all candidates entered for home examinations set by the English examination boards. The table also shows the numbers of entries for those examinations for the latest available year.

Local Authorities (Grants)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list all specific type grants paid by his Department to local authorities, showing the size of each grant, which were hypothecated to any individual service or services, or where local authorities had to bid for specific grants.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Department is responsible for two specific grants: education support grants and the in-service teacher training grant; and for the grant paid on the mandatory awards to students. All these can only be paid to local education authorities and are hypothecated to specific activities. The other information is as follows:

Grant	Purpose	Size of Grant in 1985-86 (£ million)	How allocated
Education Support Grant	To support specific activities in the interest of education in England and Wales. The activities are specified in the Education Support Grant Regulations.	27·5	LEAs are invited by Departmental circular to bid for grant support.

Grant	Purpose	Size of Grant in 1985-86 (£ million)	How allocated
In-service Teacher Training Grant	To encourage the release of teachers for in-service training in the priority areas specified in the Education (Grants for Teacher Training) Regulations.	17·5	LEAs are notified of the sums up to which they may claim grant in respect of the specified areas of training.
Mandatory Student Award	To support LEAs in providing for the maintenance and tuition fees of students in higher education, where LEAs have a statutory duty to pay grant, as laid down in the Education (Mandatory Awards) Regulations.	640	Grant is paid at a 90 per cent. rate on actual expenditure incurred.

Medical Research Council

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Eccles on 20 February, Official Report, column 286, about the composition of Medical Research Council boards, when a reply from the Medical Research Council can reasonably be expected; if he expects to receive a copy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: I understand that the Medical Research Council replied to the hon. Member on 11 March. I have received a copy of the council's letter.

Hearing-impaired Students

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will request the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals to provide him with information on the extent and nature of the provision that is made to meet the special needs of hearing-impaired students at the colleges and universities for which they are responsible.

Mr. Walden: Provision for the particular needs of hearing-impaired students has to be planned on an individual basis and the Government see this as the responsibility of the universities themselves. The Government would, however, encourage universities to consider carefully and sympathetically what provision they can make to ensure that well-qualified applicants with hearing impairment can benefit from a course of higher education.

Standards and Achievements

Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish the reports of Her Majesty's inspectors who have visited other countries in order to compare standards and achievements of schools there with standards and achievements of schools in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: Her Majesty's inspectors undertake a number of visits abroad each year, for a variety of purposes. None is concerned directly to compare standards and achievements in schools, although some do focus on aspects of provision and assessment which bear on these issues. They are often short, informal visits by one or two HMI which do not lead to full written reports. However, in June 1985 a group of Her Majesty's inspectors spent two weeks in the Federal Republic of Germany studying curriculum and examinations for 16 to 19-year-olds in ordinary schools and arrangements for the periodic assessment of pupils aged 10 to 19 throughout the school system. It is hoped that a report of that visit will be published later this year.

Local Education Authorities (Rates)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to introduce legislation to require local education authorities to pay rates on maintained schools and other educational institutions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: No. Local education authorities already pay rates on the schools and other educational institutions which they maintain.

Teachers (Salaries)

Sir Peter Hordern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is a teacher's salary at scale one, at the new rates recently negotiated, expressed per hour and per day, of actual attendance at school.

Mr. Chris Patten: The following table shows the salary of teachers at scale 1 (points 0, 6 and 13) at 31 March 1986, expressed per annum, per hour and per day.

The length of the school year or day is not strictly prescribed, nor is detailed information on practice collected by the Department. Maintained schools are, however, required to open for a minimum of 190 days a year. For illustrative purposes, this has been taken as the number of days worked. The length of the timetabled school week is also not prescribed. A typical primary timetable might involve 25 hours per week, excluding midday and other breaks and after-school activities. A typical secondary timetable on the same basis would be about 27 hours. For the purposes of this table an average of 26 hours per week has been taken. It must be stressed that these figures represent a minimum assumption.

Scale 1
Teachers salaries at 31 March 1986

	Rates per annum	Rates per day [annual salary ÷ 190]	Rates per hour [(daily salary × 5) ÷ 26]
	£	£	£
Minimum point 0	5,904	31·07	5·98
Point 6 (graduate new entrants)	7,305	38·45	7·39
Maximum point 13	9,285	48·87	9·40

Sir Peter Hordern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing the level of teachers' salaries at each scale in June 1983, and what they will be when the recent increases are implemented; and if he will show the proportionate increases at such scale, allowing for the increase in the cost of living.

Mr. Chris Patten: The following table sets out the level of teachers' salaries in April 1983 (there was no change between April and June of 1983) and April 1986. The information is provided for the minimum and maximum point on each of the teachers' scales and for selected groups of deputy headteachers and headteachers. The increase in all cases—allowing for minor rounding—is 14 per cent. This figure should be compared with an increase in the retail prices index of 12·45 per cent. from April 1983 to April 1985 (not April 1986 as there has not yet been a pay settlement for the year beginning April 1986). The real increase in teachers' pay at all levels over the period concerned is thus 1·55 per cent.

Teachers' salary rates at 1 April 1983 and 31 March 1986

	1 April 1983		31 March 1986

Scale 4	8,754	11,763	9,984	13,413

Head group 14	20,610	21,828	23,502	24,891

Note:

Although the minimum—point 0—of scale 1 is quoted it should be noted that the majority of new entrant teachers begin on point 6 of scale 1. This group received £6,405 on 1 April 1983 and shall receive £7,305 from 31 March 1986.

Postgraduate Certificate of Education (Physics)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many applicants there are for postgraduate certificates of education in physics (a) in the current year and (b) on average; how many of these are considered likely to proceed into teaching; and how many physicists left the teaching profession in 1985 other than through retirement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The available information is as follows. Up to 26 February 1986 the Graduate Teacher Training Registry had received 272 applications for entry to postgraduate certificate in education courses in physics beginning in September 1986. Students still have some months in which to make applications for any courses which are not yet full. It is not possible to estimate how many of these applications will be accepted as this is a matter for the admitting institutions. At the same time last year, 367 applications had been received.

In recent years some 80 per cent. of students who entered PGCE courses of all kinds completed their training successfully and entered teaching in the maintained sector; there is some evidence that wastage from physics courses may be higher than average.

During the year ending 31 March 1984, 311 physics graduates aged under 60 gave up teaching in full-time posts in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in England. This includes teachers taking premature retirement. Figures for the year ending 31 March 1985 are expected to be available shortly.

GCSE Examination

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether it remains his intention that the general certificate of secondary education examinations should go ahead as planned; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: The GCSE will start this year as planned, so that the benefits of this important reform can be achieved as soon as possible.

To ensure the successful start of the new examinations, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have established a national programme of in-service training for teachers unprecedented in its scale and scope. That training is currently under way.

In response to requests from local education authorities and many others for more help with the preparations and with resources, we have decided upon the following additional measures.

First, I will be proposing to the local authority associations that, subject to the consent of Parliament, £20 million of expenditure in England be supported by education support grants in the first two to three years of GCSE courses in order to help secondary schools purchase necessary additional books and equipment. My right hon. Friend is making similar arrangements for Wales.

Secondly, we will be making available a further £200,000 to the GCSE examining groups to enable them to mount additional training seminars for subject representatives from schools who failed to take advantage of seminars held since January — provided that the groups have reason to believe that those teachers will use this second opportunity.

Thirdly, in view of the wholly exceptional nature of this large reform of the school examinations system, we will be bringing regulations before the House to enable local education authorities in England and Wales to close their schools to pupils for two days in the summer term in order to allow teaching staff to undertake more GCSE in-service training than would otherwise be possible.

We are taking these measures in order to ensure that pupils starting GCSE courses this autumn gain maximum benefit from this new educational opportunity. We call upon all concerned to take advantage of these steps and to work together to make the GCSE the success it deserves to be.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much has been spent on the assisted places scheme in each local education authority in England in each year since the scheme was introduced.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986, c. 334]: The further information requested is as follows:

PRIME MINISTER

Westland plc

Q46. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if any consideration was given to bringing into the public domain the letter of 7 January from the Solicitor-General to the then Secretary of State for Defence, the right hon. Member for Henley, (Mr. Heseltine) immediately after a copy of the letter was received in her office; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to the account which I gave to the House in my statement on 23 January at columns 449-60, and in the debate on 27 January, at columns 651-58.

Northern Ireland

Q48. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Prime Minister (1) if she will take steps to institute an Ulster Grand Committee; and if she will make a statement;

(2) if she will take steps to seek to replace the current procedure for Northern Ireland legislation with a system based on primary legislation applicable throughout the United Kingdom or applicable only to Northern Ireland, as appropriate in the particular circumstances of each case; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I made it clear on 25 February that I am willing to discuss with leaders of the Ulster Unionist party and the Democratic Unionist party the arrangements for handling Northern Ireland business at Westminster.

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Prime Minister if she will seek to arrange an early meeting of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference to be attended by Defence Ministers to arrange staff talks aimed at concerted military action against terrorism on both sides of the border, including specifically co-ordination of military and police intelligence, arrangements for over-flying of the border by the Irish Air Corps, Royal Air Force and Army Air Corps and the pursuit of suspected terrorists across the border by the armed forces of the Irish Republic and the United Kingdom, and co-ordination of maritime patrols for the interception of terrorists and their shipments in Irish Republic and United Kingdom territorial waters and on the high seas.

The Prime Minister: The Intergovernmental Conference has already discussed security co-operation and the co-ordination of security force activity on both sides of the border. In both jurisdictions it is the police who have primary responsibility for dealing with terrorism under the law. The Chief Constable and Garda Commissioner have been meeting about a programme of work to be undertaken by their respective police forces aimed at enhancing co-operation in a range of areas. I am satisfied this is the right way of taking forward our mutual interest in eradicating terrorism.

European Parliament (Members' Salaries)

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Prime Minister what information she has about the annual salary of Members of the European Parliament in each of the countries of the European Community, expressed in pounds sterling.

The Prime Minister: Information of this kind is not readily available because the salaries of Members of the European Parliament are determined and paid by their national Governments. The latest information, based on July 1985 figures, is as follows:

Belgium	24,154
Denmark	*14,089
France	29,400

United Kingdom	†16,904

* Plus variable tax-free living expenses supplement of approximately £2,200.

Engagements

Mr. Spencer asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 13 March.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 13 March.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 13 March.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 13 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Dr. Anahita Ratebzad

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government will grant permission to Dr. Anahita Ratebzad for a visit to the United Kingdom to publicise Afghanistan's peace proposals; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: We do not regard the Karmal regime as a legitimate regime. It would not, therefore, be appropriate for Dr. Anahita Ratebzad, as a senior member of that regime, to visit this country. If the Karmal regime were sincere about peace it would open the way to progress in the United Nations negotiations by agreeing to the withdrawal of the 118,000 Soviet troops currently occupying Afghanistan.

EMPLOYMENT

Devon and Cornwall (EC Aid)

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Paymaster General if he will indicate for the years 1976 to 1985 the aid granted by the European Community under the European social fund for projects in Devon and Cornwall separately.

Mr. Lang: Allocation from the European social fund to vocational training and job creation schemes in Devon and Cornwall from 1983 to 1985 were as follows:

Year	Devon £	Conwall £
1983	7,000	56,531
1984	339,804	58,106
1985	654,537	31,072

Fund assistance to training schemes run by the Manpower Services Commission on a national basis (including Devon and Cornwall) are not included in the above figures.

Allocations from the fund were not analysed on a county basis before 1983.

Work Permits

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Paymaster General if he will introduce legislation imposing a requirement that companies obtaining work permits for the employment of foreign nationals should state what steps they will take to train a citizen of the United Kingdom to take over the job at the expiry of the work permit.

Mr. Lang: In many cases it is not practical to fix an expiry date, nor is it always reasonable to expect the employer to replace the overseas worker.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Kennedy asked the Paymaster General if, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye of 10 March, he will publish in the Official Report all relevant recent analysis from the 1984 labour force survey into the numbers of unemployed people who had previously been self-employed and are thus excluded from the unemployed count; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: The labour force survey showed that in Great Britain in the spring of 1984 there were about 30,000 previously self-employed people without jobs and seeking work who were excluded from the unemployment count. However, there were also some 20,000 previously self-employed claimants included in the count who were not actively looking for work and a further 30,000 claimants who did some paid work in the reference week and said they were self-employed.

Bitter and Whisky (Prices)

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Paymaster General if he will list the average price used in compiling the retail prices index of (a) a pint of ordinary bitter, 1037 original gravity, and (b) of a standard measure, one-sixth of a gill, of a typical blended Scotch whisky in the years 1960, 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1985.

Mr. Lang [pursuant to his reply, 12 March 1986, c. 476]: National average prices for beer and whisky are not used in the compilation of the retail prices index. Average prices are compiled and published only for certain items of food.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Steel Industry (EC Aid)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the European Community Commission has reached a decision on further non-quota aid under the European regional development fund for areas in the United Kingdom affected by the decline of the steel industry.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Yes. The EC Commission has announced that in principle this further aid will be made available in respect of the counties of Clwyd and Gwent in Wales, Cleveland, Humberside (together with that part of the old travel-to-work area of Scunthorpe situated in the county of Lincolnshire), South Yorkshire (including all the old travel-to-work area of Sheffield) and the Scottish region of Strathclyde.

The United Kingdom should receive about £7·5 million from the ERDF as a result of this decision. The aid will be available after the amendments required to the existing five-year programme under Council regulation (EEC) 216/1984, and the proposals for the division of aid between qualifying areas, have been drawn up by the Government and agreed with the Commission. In drawing up these proposals the Government intend to concentrate the aid available in respect of Humberside on Scunthorpe TTWA and that in respect of Strathclyde on the districts of Strathkelvin, Motherwell, Monklands and Hamilton.

In accordance with the regulation the aid will be for the clearance of rundown areas, the conversion of disused industrial buildings, the modernisation of premises for small and medium-sized enterprises, and also for aid to small firms, including grants for consultancy, the establishment or development of common services, the promotion of innovation, and market research.

Council of Industry Ministers

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the outcome of the European Community Council of Industry Ministers on 3 March.

Mr. Butcher: The Industry Council, at which I represented the United Kingdom, provided an opportunity for a preliminary exchange of views on the Community regime for state aids to shipbuilding which should apply after the fifth directive expires at the end of 1986. A further discussion will take place in the June Council.

The Council also discussed the trade in steel between Spain and Portugal and the 10 other member states. Small increases in the limits to Spanish and Portuguese exports were agreed. I registered the United Kingdom's opposition to the increase in the Spanish limit, but the decision was taken on a majority vote.

The Council made limited progress in agreeing the terms of the draft directive on the mutual acceptance of test data for the type approval of telecommunication terminal equipment and heard a progress report on the draft directive for legal protection against the copying of semiconductor chip designs. A regulation proposing a non-energy raw materials exploration loans scheme was also discussed but not agreed. I maintained our reserve on this proposal which has a low priority for the United Kingdom.

Multi-Fibre Arrangement

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he collects, in the context of the multi-fibre arrangement, concerning the comparative average annual incomes for industrial workers in (a) Brazil, (b) Turkey, (c) India, (d) Pakistan, (e) Korea, (f) Hong Kong, (g) Taiwan and (h) the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark [pursuant to his reply, 12 March 1986, c. 491]: Data on the earnings of United Kingdom manual employees is published in Employment Gazette. The Government do not collect data on the incomes of workers in the other countries, although some information is available from the OECD's monthly publication "Main Economic Indicators".

DEFENCE

Departmental Telephones

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has further to safeguard information communicated on his Department's telephones; and if he will make a statement on the present arrangements.

Mr. Younger: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) on 28 February 1986, at column 709.

Heart Disease (Army Personnel)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will institute a departmental inquiry into the rate of coronary heart disease among Army personnel and its correlation with the rate of cigarette smoking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: During the last few years the rate of smoking among Army personnel has decreased steadily. It now approximates to the civilian rate. At the same time, possibly as a direct result, the rate of death from ischaemic heart disease amongst Army personnel has also decreased and is now lower than the rate in the comparable civilian population.

The importance of achieving further reduction in smoking amongst Army personnel is fully appreciated. Considerable effort is made to reduce smoking, including films and discussions led by medical personnel during educational periods. Initiatives such as the national no smoking day are fully supported by the services.

In the light of these considerations, an inquiry is not considered necessary.

Fulbeck Airfield

Mr. Douglas Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Defence if there are any restrictive covenants or any other user restrictions which limit the use to which Fulbeck airfield may be put by his Department or anybody acting with its authority.

Mr. Lee: No.

Nuclear Submarines

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what obligations United Kingdom nuclear submarine commanders have to report immediately any leaks of radioactivity or accidents likely to endanger the public.

Mr. Stanley: There are established procedures for the immediate reporting to the Ministry of Defence of all nuclear incidents or accidents likely to endanger the public involving Royal Navy nuclear submarines.

SCOTLAND

Radioactive Milk (Holy Loch)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent information he has as to the levels of radioactivity in milk from cows in the areas adjacent to the Holy Loch.

Mr. Rifkind: The source of man-made radioactivity in milk produced around the Holy Loch is atmospheric fall-out which affects the whole of the United Kingdom. The concentrations in milk from the area are similar to those in other areas of the country of comparable rainfall.

Measurements are made of milk produced at representative dairies throughout Scotland by the National Radiological Protection board as part of its programme of surveillance of environmental radioactivity. The most recent published results are for 1983 and they are available in the report entitled "Environmental Radioactivity Surveillance Programme: Results for UK for 1983" (NRPB-R174). The main contributors to the radioactivity are strontium 90 and caesium 137 and the average concentrations during 1983 are shown in the following table:

Country	Concentration, becquerels per litre
	Strontium 90	Caesium 137
England	0·07	0·05
Scotland	0·10	0·07
Wales	0·13	0·08
Northern Ireland	0·10	0·10

I understand that the most recent results, which will be published in detail in due course, show that the concentrations of strontium 90 have not changed significantly since 1983 whilst those of caesium 137 have decreased. The levels remain of no concern radiologically and are equivalent in terms of dose of people to a tiny fraction of that due to naturally occurring background radiation.

Regular monitoring of the Holy Loch itself has continued on my behalf by the fisheries research laboratory of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The most recent results are published in the report entitled "Radioactivity in Surface and Coastal Waters of the British Isles, 1984" (Aquatic Environment Monitoring Report No. 13, MAFF, Lowestoft, 1985) which is available in the Library. They confirm that the very small discharges of low level radioactive waste from the US base have no significant effect on the environment.

Greater Glasgow Health Board

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to reduce (a) the amount of money available to and (b) the number of administrators working for the Greater Glasgow health board.

Mr. Rifkind: I have no such plans. I announced today a net revenue allocation to the Greater Glasgow health board for 1986-87 of £380·323 million, £21·083 million more than the corresponding figure for 1985-86. The staffing complement is a matter for the health board, and I understand that the board has a policy of no compulsory redundancies.

Agricultural Colleges

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his policy towards the proposal that the three Scottish agricultural colleges should be combined within a unified structure, with particular reference to the financial arrangements if any one of the colleges were to remain outside the proposed new structure.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Health Boards

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what financial allocations he has made to health boards for 1986-87.

Mr. Rifkind: I have allocated £1,445 million to health boards to meet their gross recurrent expenditure commitments on hospitals and community health services in 1986-87, and a gross amount of £37 million for their ordinary capital programmes. After expected income is taken into account, the net cash limited allocations to individual health boards are as follows:

Health board	Recurrent expenditure (net) £ million	Ordinary capital programme (net) £ million	Total £ million
Argyll and Clyde	104·172	2·700	106·872
Ayrshire and Arran	75·440	2·230	77·670

TOTAL	*1,439·996	33·950	1,473·946

* Includes £13·5 million allocated for specific commitments.

In addition to these sums I shall be allocating a further £20 million to health boards specifically for the improvement and upgrading of the NHS estate.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Lands Tribunal (Member's Correspondence)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Lands Tribunal for Northern Ireland will be in a position to reply to the letter of 16 January from the right hon. Member for Strangford in which he requested that the order following the decision of the Lands Tribunal be forwarded to Mr. Robert James Magilton of 87 Mountain Road, Whitespots, Newtownards, Co. Down, with reference to the case LDV/4/1977.

Dr. Boyson: A reply was issued on 6 March 1986.

Montefibre Plant, Coleraine

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the total of financial support given to the Montefibre plant in Coleraine by Government agencies during and since the takeover of that plant by the Montefibre Company.

Dr. Boyson: The Government were not in a position, because of the European Community's control on state aid to the synthetic fibre industry, to provide selective financial assistance or standard capital grant in respect of the acquisition of the business or any capital expenditure since. The only financial support given to the plant relates to an extensive programme of research and development which was primarily designed to find new products for the Coleraine plant. The company had a total research and development budget of £2·265 million; the Industrial Development Board's contribution to this programme amounted to some £0·448 million. The company is now liable to repay these grants.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total level of investment by the Montefibre Company in the Coleraine plant since it took over, excluding the purchase price and Government grants.

Dr. Boyson: It is estimated that the company has invested £920,000 in fixed assets since the takeover of the Coleraine plant; in addition, the Industrial Development Board has verified over £1·07 million of research and development expenditure. Thus, total investment by the company, excluding the purchase price, is £1·99 million which includes some £0·448 million of research and development grants, which are now repayable.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement outlining fully what investigations the Department of Economic Development made into the profitability of the Montefibre plant in Coleraine.

Dr. Boyson: From its examination of the audited accounts the Industrial Development Board is aware that, despite an increased turnover, the company lost £858,000 in 1985. The Industrial Development Board has also discussed the prospects for the future with the company both at local and headquarters level and is satisfied that the company has been unable to identify a way of reversing the loss-making trend.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement outlining fully what investigations the Department of Economic Development has made into alternative uses for the Montefibre site in Coleraine.

Dr. Boyson: The Montefibre site is owned by the company. The Industrial Development Board in discussions with the company has offered to co-operate in an effort to ensure that the site is utilised in the most beneficial way for the community.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement outlining what assessment the Department of Economic Development has taken of the market for the fibres produced at Montefibre, Coleraine.

Dr. Boyson: The Industrial Development Board has not made a separate assessment of the market for the fibres produced at Montefibre Coleraine. After discussion with the Montefibre management the Industrial Development Board considers that the company has taken into accord all the relevant factors in arriving at its decision.

Alcoholism

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement outlining how his Department's aim of building care in the community is to be pursued in relation to the treatment of alcoholism and funding for centres for advice, treatment, education and research on alcoholism.

Mr. Needham: The recently issued strategic planning guidelines drew the attention of health and social services boards to the need for a shift in emphasis and transfer of resources from hospital care towards the development of community alternatives. The need to change the balance of care applies to services for a wide range of problems including those caused by alcohol abuse. Boards have been asked to reflect this objective in the future planning of services.

Substantial financial support is provided to three voluntary agencies working in the field of alcohol advice, treatment, education and research. The Department and boards will continue liaising with those bodies to ensure that such resources are being used efficiently and effectively.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the future of the three alcohol advice centres in the western area administered by the Northlands centre in Derry.

Mr. Needham: The Department of Health and Social Services will continue to fund the centres for a further three-month period when the present temporary arrangement for support ends on 31 March. The limited extension of departmental funding will enable consideration to be given by the Western health and social services board and the Department to the arrangements which might be appropriate in providing financial assistance in the future to the Northlands centre.

Armagh Prison

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will give a monthly breakdown of the numbers of women prisoners in Armagh prison during 1985 and January 1986 falling into the following categories: (a) on remand, (b) attending remand hearings, (c) attending trials, (d) attending appeal hearings, (e) attending bail hearings, (f) on pre-release or compassionate home visits, (g) on interprison visits, (h) on visits to outside hospitals, (i) attending pre-release programmes, (j) attending police stations and (k) serving prison sentences.

Mr. Scott: Information is not easily available in the form requested. The same prisoners could fall into more than one of the categories specified in any one month, and could attend a number of remand, appeal or other hearings during the same period.

Tobacco Industry

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons were employed in the tobacco industry in Northern Ireland at the latest date for which figures are available.

Dr. Boyson: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 17 February 1986, at column 11.

ENERGY

Sellafield

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will indicate what proportion of the protective coating (a) above ground and (b) below ground of pond 5 at British Nuclear Fuels Ltd., Sellafield, is in steel; what proportion only in concrete; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I am advised by BNFL that there are three main operations in pond 5, which are fuel receipt, fuel storage and fuel decanning. All these operations are carried out above ground level in concrete shielded structures. The structures for both fuel receipt and fuel decanning consist of enclosed concrete shielded rooms. These rooms are steel lined across the base and partially up the walls. The structure of storage facilities consist of water retaining concrete ponds in which the fuel is stored in enclosed steel boxes under water.

Plutonium

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether any plutonium has been exported from the United Kingdom to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics since 1962.

Mr. Goodlad: No.

British Gas Corporation

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, when he next meets the chairman of the British Gas Corporation, he will raise with him the corporation's action in advising employees in the gas industry that they should not offer comment upon the subject of privatisation outside working hours; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: No. Employee relations are a matter for the British Gas Corporation.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the expenditure which will be incurred in promoting the sale of British Gas during the next financial year and in meeting the costs, fees and charges to which this sale will lead.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Estimates povision for expenditure on the sale of British Gas will be sought in the usual way. Main supply estimates for the Department's expenditure in 1986-87 will be published on 18 March.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information has been provided by his Department to foreign stock markets in regard to preparations for the privatisation of the British Gas Corporation.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Goldman Sachs, Wood Gundy, Nomura and Swiss Bank Corporation International have been appointed to advise on possible overseas sales of British Gas shares. Foreign stock markets have not yet been approached.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy what estimate he has now made of the receipts which will accrue from the planned sale of British Gas in each of the next three financial years.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave him on 16 January at column 634.

Sizewell Inquiry

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his latest estimate of the date when the report of the Sizewell inquiry will be submitted to him.

Mr. Peter Walker [pursuant to the reply, 19 November 1985, c. 101]: I now have the advice of the inspector on when he expects to deliver to me his report on the Sizewell B public inquiry.

Sir Frank Layfield has recently reviewed progress to date and what remains to be done. The inquiry over which he presided was the longest ever planning inquiry in this country; it sat for 340 days and received as evidence some 5,000 documents. It dealt with an extremely complex set of issues and Sir Frank envisages that his report will contain over 100 chapters.

The inspector has assured me that he has been provided with all the resources that were required for the work that had to be done up to now. He has discussed with the assessors arrangements that can now be made to assist him in the final stages of the work on the complex nuclear safety issues in particular. I will, of course, facilitate those arrangements so that the report can be completed as soon as possible.

The inspector has told me that, on that basis, he now hopes to deliver his report to me in September. When I receive it, I intend to reach my decisions on the inspector's report as soon as I possibly can.

Arrangements are already in hand for my Department to have available the resources that will be required for an urgent examination of the report.

ENVIRONMENT

Sports Sponsorship

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about voluntary or statutory restrictions on sponsorship of sport by tobacco companies in other European Economic Community countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: I understand that sports sponsorship by the tobacco industry is controlled in the majority of member states of the Community, whether by law or by voluntary restrictions as in the United Kingdom. I have recently seen the Tobacco Products (Control of Advertising, Sponsorship and Sales Promotion) Regulations 1986 which come into force in Eire on 1 July 1986; I am seeking further detailed information on the practice in other member states. I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Cadmium (Research)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list any research projects he is funding, has funded or intends to fund on the effects of cadmium on, and its occurrence in (a) agricultural livestock, (b) wildlife and (c) cereal crops.

Mrs. Rumbold: My Department has funded a number of investigations of cadmium contamination at various sites. These investigations included measurements of cadmium levels in soil and vegetables. The most important investigations were at Shipham (Somerset), Beaumont Leys (Leicestershire), Cassington (Oxfordshire) and Royston (Hertfordshire). Investigations of the possible toxic effects on, and measurements of accumulations of cadmium in, agricultural livestock, wildlife and cereal crops were not included in these studies. No further work is planned.

The main responsibility for the health of crops and of farm animals and for the quality of food lies with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which supports research relevant to this responsibility.

River Rother (Pollution)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the concentrations and quantities of (a) tributyltin and (b) dieldrin released into the River Rother during pollution incidents in 1985; and if he will state the source of the pollution.

Mrs. Rumbold: In October 1985 there was a leakage of tributyltin and dieldrin from a timber treatment tank into the Newmill Channel, a tributary of the River Rother. Prompt action by the Southern water authority contained the spillage, and none entered the River Rother until it had been diluted very considerably. No adverse effect was observed in the River Rother.

Anti-fouling Paints

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the brand names and manufacturers of products banned from retail sale under legislation relating to the use of tributyltin anti-fouling paints for yachts and small boats.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Control of Pollution (Anti-fouling Paint) Regulations 1985 set maximum levels of organotin compounds in anti-fouling paints which may be sold by retail. It follows that any anti-fouling paint which does not meet the criteria set out in the regulations is banned from retail sale. I understand that British manufacturers of anti-fouling paints have withdrawn the following brands since the intention to regulate was announced in July 1985:

Blakes Paints Ltd.	— Tiger Anti-fouling
Hempels Marine Paints Ltd.	— Hard Racing
International Paint plc	— Micron Clear 25

In addition, I understand that other products have been reformulated to comply with the regulations. A list of paints which manufacturers and distributors have indicated comply with the regulations was given in my answer to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) on 27 February 1986, at columns 673-75. This same list, together with a circular, has now been sent to all local authorities, as an aid in enforcing the regulations.

Land (Darlington)

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many acres of land are in public ownership in the borough of Darlington; and how many were so in March 1983.

Sir George Young: Information about the amount of land in public ownership is not available centrally. The register of unused or underused publicly owned land for the borough of Darlington contains details of 559 acres of such land. Comparable information for March 1983 is not available, but in January 1983 the register for Darlington contained details of 728 acres of land.

Country Footpaths

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he is having with county councils to seek to open up more country footpaths; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Local authorities are empowered to create new footpaths in the light of the needs of their area. The Department's circular 1/83 reminds county councils of their duties and responsibilities, including advice that obstructions on existing public rights of way should be removed promptly.

In addition, the Countryside Commission grant-aids the improvement of footpaths. The recently announced farm and countryside initiative will also be considering the improvement of local footpaths.

Enterprise Agencies

Mr. William Shelton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the estimated cost of each job created by each of the enterprise agencies established by the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Tracey: The metropolitan county councils and some other local authorities have established enterprise boards which they fund under discretionary powers. There is no statutory requirement to notify their actions and my Department does not maintain records of the cost of each job that an enterprise board may have helped to create.

Greater London Enterprise Board

Mr. William Shelton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has of the total rights and liabilities to be transferred to the residuary body arising from the activities of the Greater London enterprise board.

Mr. Tracey: No liabilities in relation to the Greater London enterprise board will pass to the London Residuary Body.

The London Residuary Body will have rights to receive payments in respect of mortgage loans made to the Greater London enterprise board by the Greater London council and, in the event of a winding up of the board, to receive the company's net assets.

Mr. William Shelton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many consents he has given under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1985 in respect of grants to the Greater London enterprise board; and for what sums.

Mr. Tracey: My right hon. Friend has given five consents to the GLC under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 to expenditure totalling £11·092 million by the GLC under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 in relation to the Greater London enterprise board. They are as follows:

1.—27 FEBRUARY 1985
£4·896 million—sufficient to:
(a) meet GLEB's staffing and overheads costs first quarter of 1985-86;
(b) allow GLEB to discharge all its 1985-86 section 137 contractual liabilities;
(c) provide for some continuation investment.

2.— 5 JULY 1985
£1·107 million maintenance funding for GLEB's existing company investments.

3.—25 JULY 1985
£0·964 million for GLEB's staffing and overheads for the second quarter of 1985-86.

4.—14 OCTOBER 1985
£2 million for the balance of GLEB's staffing and overheads costs in 1985-86.

In addition, consent was given on 14 October 1985 for the GLC to provide continuation funding of £2·125 million for the five technology networks set up by GLEB. This funding will be via GLEB's subsidiary Technet Ltd.

Consent to a further grant to GLEB for £8 million was refused on 12 March 1986.

Radioactive Waste

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to his reply of 6 March, Official Report, column 271, he will list the annual quantity of authorised discharges of uranium and other radioactive materials for each of the sites referred to since 1980.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Details of the amount of radioactive waste discharged from these sites are not held centrally. However, authorisations issued under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 specify the amounts of radioactive waste which may be discharged and I am placing copies of the relevant authorisations in the Library of the House.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the final report of his Department's study into the best practicable environmental options for the management of radioactive wastes to be made public.

Mr. Waldegrave: The report of the study carried out under my Department's direction, to establish the best practicable environmental options (BPEO) for the management of low and intermediate level radioactive wastes, is being made available today. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

This report is an essential element in our proposals for increasing public understanding of and involvement in the development of our policies for managing radioactive wastes. The House of Commons Select Committee on the Environment, in its report published yesterday, laid great stress on the importance of a well-informed, open and public debate, and welcomed this study in that context.

It demonstrates that for every type of waste several storage and disposal options are practicable and safe. All the main options for the disposal and storage of low-level and intermediate level wastes were examined. A range of assumptions about future growth in nuclear power and the level of reprocessing were considered.

Costs and radiological impacts were calculated; since the BPEO is a matter of judgment of relative priorities options were evaluated using four different sets of weights. These reflect a range of views, from those who would wish to minimise costs to those who would wish to minimise risks, local impact, or the widespread dispersion of radioactivity in the environment.

The other main conclusions of the report are that:

i. long-term storage is least attractive on economic and radiological grounds. It is attractive only if an ability to retrieve wastes easily is an overriding concern;
ii. on economic and radiological grounds an optimum strategy for storage and disposal would involve early use of all disposal options, including sea disposal;
iii. the BPEO for most low-level and some short-lived intermediate level waste is near-surface disposal, as soon as practicable, in appropriately designed trenches;

iv. no preference can be established between deep cavity disposal or off-shore borehole disposal for those intermediate level wastes with more alpha-emitting radionuclides than is acceptable for near-surface disposal or sea disposal;

v. the division, at the margin, between what is suitable for near-surface disposal in an engineered trench and deep disposal can only be explored in more detail when site-specific information is available;

vi. if future sea disposal operations are carried out this could be the preferred option for about 15 per cent. of the intermediate level waste expected to arise by 2030.

Local Government Reform

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the cost of the leaflets on the new structure of government in the metropolitan areas, published by his Department in March; how many have been printed so far; to whom they will be delivered; and what will be the cost of delivery.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Seven million leaflets have been produced at a total cost of £74,454. I have no plans to have further copies printed. The leaflets are being distributed to all households and business premises in the Greater London and metropolitan county areas at a total cost, including VAT, of £158,504.

Non-domestic Rates

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the total of non-domestic rates paid to local authorities in Great Britain in each year from 1974-75 to 1985-86 (a) gross and (b) net of all tax relief.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Estimates of non-domestic rates are as follows:

Non-domestic rate income—Great Britain

	£'000 million
1974-75	1·7
1975-76	2·2
1976-77	2·4
1977-78	2·7
1978-79	3·5
1979-80	4·0
1980-81	5·1
1981-82	6·2
1982-83	7·0
1983-84	7·4
1984-85	7·9
1985-86	8·5

Note: The estimates are derived from total rate income allocated to the non-domestic sector on the basis of its rateable value share.

Non-domestic rates are treated as a normal business expense and there is no separately identified tax relief on rates.

Voluntary Organisations (Funds)

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to allocated additional funds to approved voluntary organisations in cases where district councils have declined to make up the difference between their provisional allocations and their final allocations.

Sir George Young: No.

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to restore the amount of transitional grant to voluntary organisations in Greater Manchester to the level provisionally allocated in November 1985.

Sir George Young: No. The final allocations were based on the detailed bids made by authorities in Greater Manchester. The provisional allocations issued last year were purely illustrative.

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why final funding falls short of 75 per cent. of operating budgets for voluntary organisations in Greater Manchester for 1986-87.

Sir George Young: Local authorities are expected to fund voluntary bodies out of their own resources, as supplemented by rate support grant. Transitional grant is temporary additional assistance directed at local, not countrywide, projects taken on by individual districts. Six of the 10 Greater Manchester authorities got allocations which fully matched their bids for eligible projects. Final funding of voluntary projects in Greater Manchester depends entirely on the decisions of local authorities.

African Methodist Evangelical Church (Grant)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will make a decision on the consent for a grant from the Greater Manchester council to the African Methodist Evangelical Church under the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984.

Mr. Tracey: Further information on this application is awaited from Greater Manchester council. A decision will be reached as quickly as possible after this has been received.

Gateshead (Urban Renewal)

Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has reached a decision on proposals submitted to his urban housing renewal unit by Gateshead metropolitan borough council; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I am pleased to announce my right hon. Friend's favourable response to a proposal for a scheme in Gateshead which the metropolitan borough council has worked up in close consultation with my Department's urban housing renewal unit. We hope to reach agreement with the council on further schemes in due course.

The estate which will benefit from today's decision is the Old Fold estate in Gateshead. The council has already introduced responsive locally-based management arrangements on the estate, and is seeking to deliver a comprehensive housing service and to involve the residents in day-to-day decisions which affect their lives. The proposal agreed with the unit will be a major further step in the process of improving the quality of life on this rundown estate.

The Old Fold estate is a cottage estate of 492 dwellings built in the 1930s. The estate will benefit from a community refurbishment scheme, the aim of which is to enable unemployed people drawn mainly from the estate to work on improvements to the environment and communal areas. This scheme will provide up to 100 jobs, and will be funded by the Government's community programme, subject to the agreement of the Manpower Services Commission's area board, and my Department's urban programme. Resources of the order of £1,245,000 will be involved, including some £714,000 of urban programme funding, which I am pleased to approve in principle.

I warmly welcome the development of this package, and the close co-operation between the council and my Department's regional office and the staff and consultants of the urban housing renewal unit, which has made it possible.

Bonamy Estate, Southwark

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the results of the recent survey of demand for owner-occupation on the Bonamy estate, Southwark.

Sir George Young: The results show that over half (53 per cent.) of all tenants aged between 18 and 30 and over a third (38 per cent.) of those between 31 and 50 might try to buy a house or flat within the next 10 years, either privately or through the council. The results also show that if new houses were available this year at adjoining Bramcote Grove 31 Bonamy households would be prepared to buy. I have written to Councillor Ritchie, leader of Southwark council, expressing the hope that the new development can start soon. I have also offered to meet him.

Chemical Leak, Belvedere

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received any representations following the recent chemical leak at Belvedere.

Mrs. Rumbold [pursuant to her reply, 7 March 1986, c. 287]: I have received one letter, which has been redirected to the Secretary of State for Employment, since the leak, which affected employees of the factory concerned. This is a matter for investigation by the Health and Safety Executive.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Stanley Royd Hospital (Inquiry)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has received the reports of the Wakefield health authority and the Yorkshire regional health authority on points raised by the Stanley Royd inquiry; whether they are to be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler: I have received a letter from the chairman of the Yorkshire regional health authority enclosing both reports. The authorities are publishing their reports and the letter today. I have placed copies in the Library.

The district's report records a wide range of changes designed to achieve the highest possible catering and hygiene standards in the kitchens at Stanley Royd and elsewhere in the district. They include the production of comprehensive written instructions relating to all aspects of catering and good hygiene practice throughout the district; regular training; frequent unannounced inspections by supervisors and managers; the introduction of quality control procedures; and the appointment of a district catering manager with full responsibility and authority for catering services. The Stanley Royd kitchen staffing level and bonus scheme are being reviewed as recommended in the report. A replacement kitchen is being built at Stanley Royd and is due to be completed early next year. Substantial interim improvements to the kitchen structure and equipment have been made.

The RHA has instituted the quarterly review of capital schemes recommended by the inquiry and has made other changes designed to improve its capital planning. It has also appointed a regional catering hygiene adviser from 7 April to be responsible for ensuring high standards throughout the region. Each of the districts in the region has responded to a request from the regional health authority that it considers the inquiry report's recommendations and a summary of what went wrong at Stanley Royd. The RHA will follow up these responses.

I am pleased to note that the ratio of nurses to patients at Stanley Royd has improved considerably since September 1984 and that further improvements are being sought. The district's report reiterates that problems of recruitment rather than finance are the source of difficulty. On finance, the RHA's response confirms that it is to review its policy for the withdrawal of funds from institutions as patient numbers fall.

The responses record that the authorities decided that eight individuals should be the subject of disciplinary investigation. Subsequently, it has been decided that no further action should be taken in the case of one of these individuals while another has been dismissed as a result of disciplinary proceedings which were already in train.

The inquiry report showed that the basic cause of the outbreak was a failure in management. As the chairman of the RHA said in his letter,

"there can be no doubt that the root cause of that failure lay in the defective system of management, common throughout the health service, in which accountability and the roles of both officers and authorities was unclear".

The reports show that both authorities are making substantial changes to their management arrangements. In the case of the regional health authority the changes extend to the nature of its relationship with districts and to the development of a monitoring policy, though it is clear that much more work remains to be done on the details of monitoring. I welcome the broad thrust of the changes being made.

In the short time since the publication of the inquiry report on 21 January it would not have have been practicable for the two authorities to complete all relevant action. However, their reports show that substantial progress on a wide front has been made since the outbreak occurred: in particular, great efforts have been made to raise standards of kitchen hygiene in Wakefield's hospitals. This progress reflects close collaboration with the local environmental health officers who are satisfied that every effort is being made to raise standards at Wakefield to the highest levels.

More generally, as the House is aware, on 6 February I announced the Government's intention to bring forward legislation to apply the requirements of the Food Act 1984 to health authorities. This legal change, along with the strengthened guidance which we shall be issuing on hygiene issues, will underpin the new management measures being introduced by Wakefield and Yorkshire health authorities.

Departmental Office, Camberwell New Road

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the level of staffing and speed of response to public inquiries at his Department's office at Camberwell new road, SE5.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to the reply by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services to my hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens) on 7 March at column 322 in which he gave details of an extra 5,000 posts for local offices in the Department for 1986-87. I am confident that this increase will result in satisfactory staffing levels in individual local offices, including the local office at 6 Camberwell new road, SE5. The office's speed of response to public inquiries has shown a steady and considerable improvement since the beginning of the year.

Greenock and Port Glasgow

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people are at present awaiting the hearing of tribunal appeal cases at the Greenock and Port Glasgow offices of his Department; and how many people have experienced delays of three, four, five and six months respectively.

Mr. Major: There are 41 social security benefit appeals outstanding at the Greenock office and 76 at the Port Glasgow office.

The latest available statistics giving the period between the lodgement of an appeal and the subsequent hearing are for the quarter ended 31 December 1984 and relate to Scotland. Equivalent figures are not available for localities smaller than a social security region.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claims for single payments have been made in each quarterly period for the last three full years for which figures are available at the Greenock and Port Glasgow offices of his Department.

Mr. Major: The following figures relate to decisions on single payment claims—separate figures for claims are not kept—for each four-week period in the past three years. Figures are not kept quarterly.

Notes:

(1) A single payment claim may result in more than one decision.

(2) These figures include decisions not to pay single payments.

(3) The basis for recording decisions changed on 11 April 1984. Up to then only one decision resulted from a claim covering items under different single payment regulations. Since then a decision has been recorded for each appropriate single payment regulation covered by the claim.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary or State for Social Services how many new claims for social security were made in the past 12 months to the Greenock and Port Glasgow offices of his Department; how many of these are still awaiting assessment; and how long they have, on average, been awaiting assessment.

Mr. Major: The following figures relate to supplementary benefit claims:

	Greenock	Port Glasgow
Decisions given in 12 months up to 11 February 1986*	12,969	5,723
Awaiting assessment on 11 February 1986	507	229
Average clearance times	10 days	7½ days

* Separate figures are not collected for supplementary benefit claims received.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many live claims for social security the Greenock and Port Glasgow offices of his Department are currently handling.

Mr. Major: On 11 February 1986 the supplementary benefit live load at Greenock was 11,386 and at Port Glasgow 5,030. The figures are marginally higher than the numbers of live claims being handled at that time because they include some claims which had recently finished.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many requests for home visits have been received by the Greenock and Port Glasgow offices of his Department in the past 12 months; how many are currently outstanding; and on average, for how long they have been outstanding.

Mr. Major: Information is not available in the precise form requested because records are not kept of the number of requests for home visits. In the 12 months up to 11 February 1986, 7,685 home visits were made (including those initiated by the Department), 317 are currently outstanding and the average clearance time was just under 12 days. The comparable figures for Port Glasgow show that 3,293 home visits were made, 53 are currently outstanding and the average clearance time was just over 11 days.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will state the approved and actual staffing levels at the Greenock and Port Glasgow offices of his Department in March 1980, March 1982, March 1985 and the latest available date; and if he will give the number of live claims in the two offices for each of these dates.

Mr. Major: The information requested is as follows:

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many urgent needs payments have been made to claimants in the last 12 months by the Greenock and Port Glasgow offices of his Department; and how many are currently outstanding.

Mr. Major: In the 12-month period up to 11 February 1986, 884 urgent needs payments were made at Greenock and 380 at Port Glasgow. Neither office had any outstanding on that date.

Community Care

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, of the money set aside for the help the community to care scheme, how much of the original sum has been spent; and on what projects.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the right hon. Member to my reply to him on 27 January at columns 397-98.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration has been given to giving funding to organisations whose work load has increased as a consequence of the help the community to care project, notably the Association of Crossroads Care Attendant Schemes.

Mr. Whitney: It is open to any organisation, including Crossroads, to charge for its services when its help or advice is sought by those managing individual elements of the helping the community to care programme. In general, we provide core support to national voluntary organisations through our scheme of grants under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968. I am pleased that we have been able to increase our grant to Crossroads under that scheme to £75,000 a year.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much money from the help the community to care scheme has been given to (a) Age Concern, (b) the British Red Cross, (c) the King's Fund Centre, (d) MENCAP, (e) Dr. Barnardo's, (f) the Save the Children Fund and (g) Crossroad Care Attendant schemes in the last year.

Mr. Whitney: Figures for 1985-86 are not yet available, but the table shows the payments made to the bodies concerned in 1984-85:

Age Concern	13,500
King's Fund Centre	20,984
MENCAP	50,000
Save the Children Fund	82,000

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans the Government have to encourage the growth of community care.

Mr. Whitney: For a detailed discussion of our aims and our action in relation to community care for mentally handicapped and mentally ill people, I refer my hon.

Friend to the Government response to the second report from the Social Services Committee, on community care (Cmnd. 9674), published in November last year. We seek to encourage the development of good quality integrated local services to meet a range of needs by publicising policies, disseminating good practice, and promoting co-operation between statutory bodies and between them and voluntary bodies and the private sector in making the best use of the available resources.

Health Authorities

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what are the names of those district health authorities where the most senior adviser to the health authority is the director of nurse education;

(2) what are the names of those district health authorities which, consequent on the Griffiths committee recommendations, have (a) abolished the post of chief nursing officer or its equivalent and (b) appointed such officers but have not made them members of the district management board.

Mr. Hayhoe: Every health authority has identified a chief nursing adviser to be the principal source of professional advice on nursing matters to the authority and to be responsible for monitoring professional standards of nursing care throughout the authority. Titles vary although I understand that 73 health authorities have retained the title of chief or district nursing officer. Where the chief nursing adviser is not a full member of an authority's management board or team it should be by agreement locally. I regret that information is not held centrally on the members of authorities where this is the case, or where the chief nursing adviser role is also combined with that of director of nurse education although I understand that only a small number of authorities are involved.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the numbers of district health authority chairmen and chairwomen who wished to continue in office but who were not reappointed in each year since 1979, together with their length of service.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the names of those health authorities which, consequent on the implementation of the Griffiths committee's recommendations, have proposed early retirement or required termination of employment of nurses, together with the relevant number in each authority.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that no information is held centrally on termination of employment other than by early retirement. To date my Department has been informed of nine early retirements of nurses resultant to the implementation of general management, one in each of the following health authorities:

North West Durham
Great Yarmouth and Waveney
Peterborough
South West Hertfordshire
Hillington
Isle of Wight
Winchester
Cheltenham
Solihull

Residential Care

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what Government regulations there are on the opening and operation of private residential care homes; and whether the Government carry out regular inspections of the homes.

Mr. Whitney: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 16 December 1985 at column 80.

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the amount given to National Health Service residential care homes for the mentally handicapped; and what it was in 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Whitney: The term "residential care home" is defined in the Registered Homes Act 1984 in connection with private and voluntary sector homes and not used for National Health Service provision. We are planning, for 1985-86, for the first time to collect and analyse information on expenditure in respect of small National Health Service units in the community for mentally handicapped people. Information on the allocation of funds to these units is not available centrally.

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the qualifications necessary to work in a National Health Service residential care home; what they are to work in a private home; why the qualifications differ; and whether the Government have any intention of changing this.

Mr. Whitney: No specific qualifications are laid down centrally for the staff of residential homes, which are either operated by local authorities (not by the National Health Service) or are privately owned and registered with local authorities. It is for local authorities to decide what qualifications or experience they require of their own staff and whether the staff of homes registered with them are suitably qualified and competent. In a circular, LAC (86) 6, about to be issued, local authorities are reminded that they should be broadly consistent about standards across the public and private sectors and should not expect higher standards in registered homes than they have in their own homes. A copy of the circular will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the increase of residential places provided by local authorities since 1981 for the elderly, the mentally ill and the handicapped.

Mr. Whitney: The increase in residential places provided by local authorities between 31 March 1981 and 31 March 1985, the latest date for which provisional figures are available, is shown in the table.

Places in Local Authorities Homes in England

	at 31 March 1981	at 31 March 1985 (provisional)
Elderly/disabled people	114,921	116,100
Mentally handicapped people	12,712	15,200
Mentally ill people	3,981	4,400

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the Government's reasons for giving board and lodging benefits to those in private residential care homes.

Mr. Newton: Supplementary benefit is paid to people without enough resources to meet their requirements as specified in regulations. The regulations define the requirements of people in homes as equivalent to the charge they have to pay, subject to maximum limits which are related to the types of care which the home is registered to provide.

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what changes have been made in benefits to those in private residential care homes since 1979.

Mr. Newton: The history is given in the introduction to the report of the joint working party on supplementary benefit and residential care, publication of which I announced in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) on 28 January at column 501. A copy of the report is in the Library.

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current waiting period for someone seeking admission into National Health Service homes for the elderly and into National Health Service homes for the mentally ill in Hertfordshire.

Mr. Whitney: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. Friend the information he seeks in precisely the form requested. Information available centrally concerns the numbers of persons awaiting admission to consultant departments of NHS hospitals and is given in the table.

Number of cases on in-patient waiting list for selected specialties—NHS hospitals in Hertfordshire at 30 September 1985 (provisional)*

Specialty	All cases	Cases on list for more than one year
Geriatrics	33	—
Mental illness	22	16
Psychogeriatrics	7	—

* None of these cases was reported as urgent.

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what amount of money has been given in supplementary benefit to people receiving care in private homes for the elderly, the mentally ill and the handicapped; and what was the increase from 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Newton: In 1983 the amount paid in supplementary benefit to people in all private voluntary residential care and nursing homes was £102 million. The estimated figure for 1984 is £190 million. No figures are yet available for 1985. It is not possible to break down the figures by all the client groups requested, or to distinguish between private and voluntary homes.

Carers

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what changes have been made in benefits to those caring for the elderly, mentally ill or disabled persons since 1979.

Mr. Newton: Eligibility for invalid care allowance was extended in 1981 to those caring for non-relatives. In 1982 the amount that beneficiaries are allowed to earn was doubled from £6 to £12 a week. As regards supplementary benefit, the qualifying period for moving from the ordinary to the long-term scale rate was reduced from two years to one year in 1980.

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Social Services as invalid care allowance is not extended to married women, what steps are taken to ensure that married women are able to have the necessary home help, such as a visiting nurse.

Mr. Whitney: Domestic help is available for those who are assessed to be in need of it from local authority home help services. It rests with district health authorities to assess, in individual cases, the need to provide community nursing services.

Rotherham Health Authority

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the discharge of its functions by Rotherham health authority.

Mr. Hayhoe: The regional health authority concerned is generally responsible for monitoring the way in which individual district health authorities discharge their functions but I am not aware of any general dissatisfaction with the Rotherham health authority.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services for what reasons the services of Mr. Vernon Thomas as chairman of the Rotherham health authority are being terminated.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Supplementary Benefit

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people are in receipt of supplementary benefit in the area of Oxted, Surrey.

Mr. Major: Separate figures showing the number of people receiving supplementary benefit in Oxted, Surrey, are not available. Oxted forms a small part of the area covered for supplementary benefit purposes by the Department's office at Redhill. On 11 February 1986, the latest date for which information is available, there were 7,945 people receiving supplementary benefit from Redhill office.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people are presently awaiting single payments in the north-west region of his Department and nationally; and how many have been waiting for more than four weeks, eight weeks and 12 weeks, respectively.

Mr. Major: I regret that this information is not available.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many single payments were made from the Huyton office of his Department during each of the last five years and in 1986 to date.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Severe Weather Payments

Ms. Harriet Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people successfully claimed exceptionally severe weather payments in Oxted, Surrey, in 1985; and what was the average amount paid.

Mr. Newton: The information is not available in the form requested. Oxted, Surrey, forms part of the area covered by Redhill local office. In 1985 that office paid 174 claimants an average of £11·71 in respect of extra fuel used during the period of exceptionally severe weather.

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to answer the question concerning his Department's achievements tabled by the hon. Member for Crawley on 18 February.

Mr. Fowler: As soon as possible.

Smoking-related Diseases

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many days were lost from work in 1985 through emphysema, bronchitis and other chest and heart diseases which have connections with cigarette smoking.

Mr. Whitney: Most recent figures for the main conditions are:

Days of Certified Incapacity for Sickness and Invalidity Benefit: Great Britain—5 April 1982 to 2 April 1983

Cause	*ICD Code	Million Days
Emphysema	492	1·9
Bronchitis	490, 491	19·9
Other Obstructive Lung Disease	496	1·4
Malignant Neoplasm of Trachea, Bronchus and Lung	162	0·3
Ischaemic Heart Disease	410-414	30·9

* International Classification of Diseases, 9th Revision.

No information is available on uncertified absences from work.

Drugs

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he intends to implement the proposals made to him by the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry to terminate the parallel import of drugs.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am not aware of any such proposals from the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what changes are intended in National Health Service pharmaceutical prices and distribution costs from 1 April; what are his intentions for the recovery of discounts on parallel import drugs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: There will be no general change in the manufacturers' prices of medicines covered by the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme (PPRS) until the present negotiations for a renewal of the scheme are completed and the changes thus agreed are implemented. These negotiations continue, with a view to introducing a renewed scheme during 1986-87.

The majority of NHS medicines are subject to control under the PPRS, but prices reimbursed to pharmacies for generic medicines are determined separately. Agreement has been reached with representatives of generic manufacturers on a number of changes, which will reduce the average NHS price of generic medicines. Agreement has also been reached with representatives of NHS community pharmacies for an interim increase of 1·5 per cent. in the average rate of deduction from their reimbursement to reflect the discounts now widely obtainable on the published prices of pharmaceutical products generally. The new rates of discount recovery will average nearly 7·5 per cent. and are subject to revision in the light of the results of a full inquiry into discount levels which will start shortly and be completed by early 1987. Details of the changes in generic prices and the discount recovery scale will be published in the April amendment to the drug tariff. Taken together, these changes should bring a saving of nearly £30 million in NHS expenditure.

I also intend to establish an informal working group involving representatives of manufacturers, wholesalers and NHS retail pharmacies which will assess more generally and for the longer term the arrangements for the financial regulation of NHS pharmaceutical distribution. I have invited the interests concerned to nominate members of the working group, and hope to appoint an independent chairman. I expect the group to report this summer.

Estimates from various sources suggest that parallel imports account for a small fraction of NHS medicines. All discounts on both domestic and parallel imported drugs will be identified by the discount inquiry. When this information is available I will consider how to modify the reimbursement system to ensure that the arrangements are fair to all concerned.

National Maritime Board

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what date the National Maritime Board obtained the status of a community health council; and by which statutory instrument that status was given effect.

Mr. Whitney: The National Maritime Board has not been granted the status of a community health council.

Technical Services Agency Ltd

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a copy of his response to the letter dated 5 March from the Technical Services Agency Ltd., Glasgow, on Scottish climate and severe weather energy penalties in tenanted housing.

Mr. Newton: The letter dated 5 March from the Technical Services Agency Ltd., was received on 11 March. This is being considered and I will send the hon. Member a copy of the reply.

NHS Hospitals (Private Patients)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many private patients had appointments with consultants in National Health Service hospitals in the west midlands region in each of the last seven years; what sums were paid to each authority in the region for the use of rooms for such consultations; and what was the length of the waiting lists for different categories of treatments in each authority each year during the same period.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 7 March 1986, c. 317.]: The available information is given in the tables.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Common Agricultural Policy (Budget)

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what would be the reduction in each case in the common agricultural policy budget for 1986 as a result of a 1 per cent. price reduction on the EEC Commission's price proposals for each of the following commodities: cereals, milk, beef and olive oil

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Dairy Products (Subsidy)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, pursuant to his reply of 10 March concerning the decision of the Commission not to publish the rates of subsidy for export of dairy products, it will still be the practice of Her Majesty's Government to make such details available to hon. Members in reply to parliamentary questions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: We intend to continue to answer hon. Members' questions in the usual way.

Broilermeat and Chickenmeat

Mr. Eadie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the imports of broilermeat and chickenmeat in Scotland, England and Wales in the years 1983, 1984, 1985 and to the nearest available date in 1986; and if he will give the ports of entry.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1986, c. 437]: The table shows the information requested.

Pesticides

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in which counties in England and Wales pesticide registration authorities require products for home and garden use to be packed in child-restraint packages and rodenticides to be used only in tamper-proof bait stations; and what proposals are presently being considered by his Department under the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 to control packaging on a nationwide basis.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 12 March 1986, c. 483]: There are no local pesticide registration authorities in the United Kingdom. Registration of pesticides is at present carried out on a nationwide basis under the non-statutory pesticides safety precautions scheme. It has not been possible to control packaging precisely as the hon. Member suggests under these non-statutory arrangements, but it has been a fundamental principle of the scheme that only low toxicity products in small volume packs are cleared for home and garden use and that the labels carry warnings to keep the products or baits away from children or pets. In addition, certain products are supplied in child-resistant bait stations.

It is proposed that under the regulations to be made under part III of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 it be made a condition of the approval of a pesticide that the container in which it is supplied be approved by the Government for that purpose; supply in a different container thus becoming a criminal offence. In setting standards for containers the Government will rely on the advice of the Advisory Committee on Pesticides and the newly constituted Panel on Labelling and Container Design.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Construction Industry

16. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received from the construction industry about the incidence of taxation on that industry.

Mr. Moore: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations, covering a variety of proposals.

Income Tax

17. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the yield of all taxation from those earning £30,000 or more in 1985-86.

Mr. Moore: The total income tax yield in 1985-86 from individuals with taxable income above £30,000 is £4½ billion, of which nearly £2 billion is paid on taxable income in excess of £30,000. It is not possible to estimate the yield of other taxes from this group.

33. Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes there have been in the number of people paying income tax since 1979; how this compares with the previous five year period; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: The estimated numbers of individual taxpayers (including earning wives) since 1973-74 are as follows:

(thousands)

	Individual taxpayers
1973-74	23,100
1974-75	24,300

* Provisional.

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the effects of changes in personal taxation on disposable incomes for each year since 1978-79 for single people, married couples (both working, without children) and married couples (husband only working, with two children) on 50 per cent., 75 per cent., 100 per cent., 150 per cent., 200 per cent. and 500 per cent. of average earnings expressed in current and constant prices and as a percentage of gross earnings; and what is his estimate for 1986-87 on the basis of the conventional assumptions of index-linked allowances and duties.

Mr. Moore: The information is in the following tables.

Notes

*Estimates do not include income-related benefits to which some taxpayers may be entitled.

†Earnings are based on adult rates for those in full time work with pay unaffected by absence.

‡Assuming husband and wife have earnings at the same multiple of the earnings distribution for full time males and full time females respectively.

‖Child benefit assumes two children aged under 11.

¶Average earnings are assumed to increase by 7 per cent. between 1985-86 and 1986-87, as in the Autumn Statement, 1985.

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the effects of changes in personal taxation on disposable incomes for each year since 1978-79 for single people, married couples (both working, without children), and married couples (husband only working, without children), for the lowest decile, lowest quartile, median, upper quartile, median, upper quartile and highest decile of all males and females, expressed in current and constant prices and as a percentage of gross earnings; and what is his estimate for 1986-87 on the basis of the conventional assumptions of index-linked allowances and duties.

Mr. Moore: Information in the following tables is based on estimates of earnings for those in full-time work paid at adult rates, with pay unaffected by absence. Estimates are based on information from the annual new earnings surveys. Latest information is for April 1985.

Income tax rates and allowances for April 1979 are those specified in the Finance Act 1979, later replaced by those announced in June 1979; for other Aprils, they are the rates and allowances for the financial year immediately following. Taxpayers are assumed to have no reliefs or allowances other than the appropriate personal allowance. National insurance contributions are at the contracted-in rate.

The calculations take no account of income-related benefits to which those at the lowest decile and quartile may be entitled. Changes in the purchasing power of net earnings have been calculated by reference to movements in the general index of retail prices between Aprils.

† Assuming husband and wife have earnings at the same quantile of the earnings distribution for full-time males and full-time females respectively.

Mr. Pike asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the increase in take-home pay for (a) a single person and (b) a married couple from an increase of 10 per cent. in the threshold for the basic rate of income tax.

Mr. Moore: For basic rate taxpayers in 1986-87 the increase would be £1·27 per week for a single person and £2·02 per week for a married couple.

Sir Peter Hordern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what a single person earning £140 a week would pay now, in income tax and national insurance contributions, at current rates, allowances and rate bands; and what such a person would pay at 1978-79 rates, allowances and rate bands;

(2) what a single person earning £8,500 a year would have to pay in income tax (a) at current rates, allowances and rate bands and (b) at rates, allowances and rate bands obtaining in June 1979.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of average earnings has been represented by personal income tax allowances in each of the last 20 years for which figures are available; and what was the percentage change in such allowances in each of those years on the previous year's figures.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 5 February 1986, c. 185]: The information is given in the table. Tax thresholds are shown as percentages of both average manual earnings and (for 1970-71 onwards) average earnings for all occupations.

Job Creation

18. Mr. Maclennan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received from the Confederation of British Industry concerning the scale of resources currently allocated to measures designed to deal with unemployment.

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations from the Confederation of British Industry in recent weeks.

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is able to give an estimate of the number of jobs created as a result of the measures introduced by each Budget statement since 1979.

Mr. MacGregor: Changes in employment since 1979 have been due to a whole range of factors. It is not possible to attribute the changes directly to the various measures announced in successive Budget statements since that time.

29. Mr. Livsey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received concerning the effect of his taxation policies on employment.

Mr. Moore: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations on this issue.

Mortgage Interest Relief

19. Mr. Nicholls asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received advocating the abolition of income tax relief on mortgage interest.

Mr. Moore: My right hon. Friend has received a few such representations.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

20. Mr. Alton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the level of the public sector borrowing requirement over the last 10 months.

Mr. MacGregor: Public sector borrowing in the first 10 months of 1985-86 was £3·2 billion, as announced on 18 February.

Public Expenditure

21. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received about his latest forecasts for public expenditure.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville).

22. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in central Government's current spending in each year since 1980; and what are the corresponding figures for local government.

Mr. MacGregor: Between 1980-81 and 1984-85 central Government current spending rose by 46·3 per cent. and local authority current spending relevant for RSG by 37·5 per cent. Two of the major factors behind the increase in public expenditure — defence and the increase in numbers unemployed — have had a significant impact on central Government current spending. The 1984-85 figures are also affected by the impact of the coal strike. The full figures are given in the table.

* Including finance for public corporations.

32. Mr. Wood asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about representations he has received on public expenditure in 1986-87.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville).

34. Mr. Fallon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will review the working of the public expenditure territorial block formulae.

Mr. MacGregor: The working of the territorial block formulae is kept under constant review.

35. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about the public expenditure in 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: We receive representations on public expenditure matters throughout the year. The latest estimated outturn for 1985-86 will be given on Budget day.

Departmental Staff

23. Mr. Watts asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the reduction in the number of staff in post in central Government Departments between May 1979 and the latest date for which figures are available; and which is the last year in which a lower number was in post.

Mr. Brooke: At 1 January 1986 (against a target of 600,475 on 1 April 1986), there were 596,506 staff in central Government Departments, a reduction of 135,769 since 1 April 1979. There was a lower figure at 1 October 1985 (595,764). The next comparable figure was in 1939 when there were 347,000 staff in Government Departments. No figures are available for the years 1940-43, but by 1 April 1944 staff in post numbers had risen to nearly 1·2 million.

Gross Domestic Product

24. Mr. Baldry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the United Kingdom's gross domestic product per head; and how this compares with each of the United Kingdom's Community partners in the latest year for which figures are available.

25. Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on the gross domestic product per head of population for (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Puerto Rico, (c) Yugoslavia and (d) Taiwan for the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. MacGregor: In 1984 United Kingdom gross domestic product per head stood at £5,600. The table gives a set of comparative figures for the countries requested.

Country	GNP per head 1984 (US dollars)
Denmark	10,690
Germany, Federal Republic	10,030
Luxembourg	9,240
France	8,910
Netherlands	8,530
Belgium	7,700
United Kingdom	7,500
Italy	6,110
Ireland	4,990
Spain	4,190
Puerto Rico	*3,890
Greece	3,380
Taiwan	*2,600
Portugal	1,910
Yugoslavia	*1,640

* Figures are for 1983: 1984 figures are not yet available.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the proportion of gross domestic product taken by (a) central Government current expenditure, (b) central Government capital expenditure, (c) local government current expenditure, (d) local government capital expenditure and (e) all public expenditure in each year from 1979-80 to 1985-86.

Mr. MacGregor: General Government expenditure, and the components requested, as a percentage of GDP are as follows:

	1979-80 outturn	1980-81 outturn	1981-82 outturn	1982-83 outturn	1983-84 outturn	1984-85 outturn	Per cent. 1985-86 estimated outturn
Central Government Current	28½	30½	32	32½	32	33	32

	1979-80 outturn	1980-81 outturn	1981-82 outturn	1982-83 outturn	1983-84 outturn	1984-85 outturn	Per cent. 1985-86 estimated outturn
Capital	3	3	2½	2½	1½	1	1½
Local authorities
Current	10	10½	10½	10½	10½	10½	10
Capital	2	2	1½	1½	1½	1½	1
General Government expenditure	43½	46	46½	46½	46	45½	44½

It should be noted that central Government current spending includes most defence expenditure, much of which is of a capital nature, and that both central government and local authority capital spending include sales of physical assets. This particularly affects local authority capital spending which is reduced as a result of council house sales. Table 1.14 of the 1986 public exenditure White Paper adjusts for these factors.

International Monetary Conference

26. Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received concerning the need for an international monetary conference.

Mr. Ian Stewart: My right hon. Friend has received no such representations recently.

Infrastructure Projects

27. Mr. Hicks asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to bring forward measures to increase investment in public infrastructure projects; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The 1986 public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9702) set out the Government's spending plans for future years. It showed increases over previous plans in capital spending, notably on housing renovation and roads.

Civil Service Catering Organisation

28. Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied with the working of the Civil Service Catering Organisation; how he monitors its effectiveness; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I am satisfied with the working of the Civil Service Catering Organisation. Catering is one of the services which is subject to competition and the organisation now operates on an almost wholly commercial basis. Having only a token Vote, the organisation is required to meet all its expenditure from the receipts from restaurant customers and the Departments it serves. The chief executive reports to me regularly throughout the year on its performance. In addition, the organisation has developed value for money indicators and established targets for 1985-86 which it has more than met. Further improvements are expected in 1986-87.

Share Ownership

30. Mr. Sayeed asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to increase share participation by employees in their own and other publicly quoted companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I cannot anticipate my right hon. Friend's Budget statement. However the Government remain firmly committed to supporting both employee share ownership and wider share ownership generally. Our policies have already encouraged the introduction and operation of large numbers of employee share schemes, and have enabled millions of people to obtain shares in privatised companies.

VAT and Income Tax

31. Mr. Maclean asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the levels of value added tax and income tax for 1986-87.

Mr. Moore: A number.

Manufacturing Output

36. Mr. Hunter asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures he intends taking to encourage an increase in United Kingdom manufacturing output.

Mr. MacGregor: Our policies to exert downward pressure on inflation and to stimulate the supply side of the economy will continue to maintain an environment in which all sectors of the economy can flourish. Supply side policies promote the flexible operation of labour, goods and financial markets by sharpening incentives, encouraging competition and enterprise, and promoting deregulation. Measures include privatisation, contracting out of public services, the simplification of taxes to remove distortions and improve incentives to work, and reforms to ease rigidities in the labour market. The fall in oil prices and its effects will of course bring substantial benefits to the manufacturing sector. The Government also provide substantial direct assistance to manufacturing industry. In 1984-85 over £2 billion, largely going to manufacturing industry, was provided through regional and territorial spending, through support to particular sectors, support to exports and through expenditure on training. [A detailed breakdown is given in the annex to the Government's reply to the report of the House of Lords Select Committee (Cmnd. 9697).]

Oil

37. Mr. Portillo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement on the role of oil in the United Kingdom economy.

Mr. MacGregor: Like other industrialised countries the United Kingdom is a major oil consumer. Unlike most of the other countries the United Kingdom is also an oil producer. But North sea oil and gas accounts for only 5 to 6 per cent. of national income and only 5 per cent. of our capital investment. Net oil exports make up 8 per cent. of total exports. North sea revenues constitute 8½ per cent. of total United Kingdom tax revenues. And North sea related employment represents under ½ per cent. of total United Kingdom employment.

Unemployment Costs

38. Mr. Strang asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of net average cost to the Treasury of an unmarried man who is unemployed, as against one in employment on average earnings.

Mr. MacGregor: The estimated average cost per beneficiary of benefits paid in respect of unemployment is £2,400 for 1985-86. The corresponding figure for an unmarried man is not available. It is not possible to estimate the revenue foregone.

Public Sector Investment

39. Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his most recent estimate of the proportion of gross domestic product spent on public sector investment.

Mr. MacGregor: Total public sector capital spending, as shown in table 1.14 of the 1986 public expenditure White Paper, was some £21 billion in 1984-85, representing 6·5 per cent. of GDP.

Petrol (Revenue Tax and Duty)

40. Mr. Jessel asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the current yields of petrol revenue tax and petrol duty.

Mr. Moore: Receipts of petroleum revenue tax (including advance payments) and petrol duty in 1984-85 were £7,177 million and £4,680 million respectively.

Inflation

Mr. Spencer asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the current level of inflation.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Over the 12 months to January 1986, the retail prices index increased by 5·5 per cent.

Devon and Cornwall (EC Aid)

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list separately for the counties of Devon and Cornwall for the period 1976 to 1985 the moneys received in each of the counties as loans from the European investment bank.

Mr. Brooke: The value of loans signed for the period 1976 to 1985 is shown in the following table:

Direct loans from EIB Own Resources

£ million

	Devon	Cornwall
1976	—	4·0
1977	—	2·5
1978	4·0	—
1979	7·2	—
1980	*2·1	*3·9
1981	*2·1	*6·9
1982	*3·6	*1·4
1983	4·0	—
1984	*7·6	*1·4
1985	10·0	—
Total	40·6	20·1

* Includes EIB rough estimate of allocations to Cornwall/Devon in respect of four EIB loans for water supply and sewerage treatment in the south-west region conducted by the South West water authority.

In addition, the two counties may have benefited from global loans to help small and medium-sized enterprises in the assisted areas, but detailed information on these loans is not readily available.

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will indicate for the years 1976 to 1985 the value of aid granted for projects in Devon and Cornwall separately by the European Community under the supplementary measures.

Mr. Brooke: Supplementary measures did not begin until 1980, when the United Kingdom's transitional own resources arrangements agreed on accession expired.

Payments under the 30 May 1980 agreement to reduce the United Kingdom's net contribution by supplementary measures were made in respect of the 1980, 1981 and 1982 budgets. They included expenditure in support of public expenditure programmes in the assisted areas of the south-west region, that is the whole of Cornwall and the western part of Devon. The total money involved was

£ million

	1980 (paid in 1981)	1981 (paid in 1982)	1982 (paid in 1983)
Roads programme		0·3	6·4
Rail programme	3·7		0·6
Electricity		2·0
Water & sewerage	5·3	7·6	3·9
Telecommunications	13·8	12·8	5·1
Total	22·8	22·7	16·0

Most of these programmes covered a large number of small projects and it is not possible to allocate them between Devon and Cornwall. Two projects in Cornwall which did receive specific support from the 1980 and 1981 refunds were the St. Neots-Colliford impounding reservoir and the Camborne-Redruth main drainage scheme.

Arrangements for refunds in respect of 1983 were different, and the payments were all allocated to individual projects. Those in the Devon and Cornwall area which received support were work on the M5 near Tiverton (Devon) (£4·7 million) and work on the A38 at the Tamar bridge (£10·8 million).

Westland plc

Mr. Dalyell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has had any discussions with the Governor of the Bank of England regarding the role of the bank in the financial restructuring of Westland plc; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lawson: No.

Council House Sales

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce legislation to permit private developers involved in the refurbishment or redevelopment for sale of local authority housing to pass on value added tax invoices to the local housing authority for recovery of the tax; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I cannot anticipate my right hon. Friend's Budget statement.

Budget

Mr. Canavan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received about his forthcoming Budget.

Mr. Brooke: A considerable number.

Revenue

Dr. Cunningham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the estimated total yield of (a) income tax, (b) value added tax, (c) all other taxes, (d) all Customs and Excise duties, (e) all miscellaneous income to the Exchequer (other than borrowing), (f) public sector borrowing and (g) rates in each year from 1979-80 to 1985-86.

Mr. MacGregor: The figures are as follows:

£ billion

		Customs and Excise duties
	Personal income tax	Value added tax	Other	Local authority rates	Other taxes (including royalties)	Miscellaneous income	Public sector borrowing requirement
1979-80	20·9	10·1	10·0	6·9	12·8	16·4	10·0

1982-83	30·4	14·5	14·4	12·2	20·4	25·1	8·9
1983-84	31·3	16·1	15·9	12·3	21·3	27·6	9·7
1984-85	32·6	18·3	17·0	13·0	24·5	29·7	10·1

Spirits (Excise Duty)

Mr. George Gardiner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest forecast of receipts from excise duty on spirits in 1985-86; and how much of this figure is attributable to the change in the rate of duty in the Finance Act 1985.

Mr. Brooke: I have nothing further to add to the reply I gave my hon. Friend on 20 December 1985, at column 361.

Savings Schemes (Advertising)

Mr. Freud asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the amount of money spent on advertising each of the different Government savings schemes together with a table of the interest paid on capital for each scheme.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Customs Officers (Drug Enforcement)

Mr. Evennett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many Customs officers were permanently assigned to drug enforcement duties at the latest available date; and how many were so assigned (a) five and (b) 10 years ago.

Mr. Brooke: The number of Customs investigators and preventive staff will be 3,262 at 31 March 1986; five years ago it was 3,179; the figure for 10 years ago is not available. Within these totals, effectiveness has been increased by shifting resources to specialist drugs investigation, where numbers have more than doubled, and to mobile and other specialised units supported by improved training and equipment.

A further 300 preventive officers are being appointed in the course of 1986-87, and £10 million is being made available for the development and purchase of drugs detection equipment over the next three years.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Montefibre, Coleraine

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing what Government grant-aid was given in repect of the producer-dyed acrylic fibre spinning machine which Monsanto introduced to the plant in Coleraine now owned by Montefibre and explaining what had happened to this machine.

Dr. Boyson: I am unable to provide details of grant assistance paid to Monsanto plc prior to October 1980 as this information is confidential under the terms of the agreement entered into with the company. Such assistance has, however, now passed outside the control period during which grant may be reclaimed in the event of disposal. The possibility of reclaiming grant related to subsequent refurbishment of this machinery is being examined. It is understood that the machinery in question is now located at a Montefibre plant in Spain.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing what Government grant-aid was given in respect of the Seydel converter installed by Monsanto in the Coleraine plant now owned by Montefibre and explaining what has happened to this machine.

Dr. Boyson: I am unable to provide the detailed information requested as agreements to provide selective financial assistance were subject to a confidentiality condition prior to October 1980. The Seydel converter was, however, grant-aided in 1972 and remained in use at Coleraine for well beyond the mandatory control period of three years. It is understood that this machinery is now located in Spain.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing how much grant aid was given in respect of plant installed by Monsanto in the Coleraine plant now owned by Montefibre and which is now packed for shipment to India.

Dr. Boyson: I am unable to provide details of grants paid to Monsanto plc prior to October 1980 as this information is confidential under the terms of the agreement entered into with the company. However, the last grant was paid in 1978 and the assets aided are therefore outside the period of three years in which the Government have an interest in their disposal.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what regard was paid to the changes in oil prices in the Department of Economic Development's assessment of the profitability of the Montefibre plant.

Dr. Boyson: The Industrial Development Board has not undertaken a separate assessment of the profitability of the Montefibre plant. It is satisfied that the management of the company has taken into account all the relevant factors in arriving at its decision.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the development at Montefibre, Coleraine, of a new optic fibre; and where Montefibre now intends to produce this product.

Dr. Boyson: In 1984 the company undertook at Coleraine a research and development programme to develop a new optic fibre. As this product was being developed specifically for the United Kingdom market the company has informed the Industrial Development Board that it has no plans to produce it elsewhere within the group.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the development of the new non-recrimped staple at Montefibre, Coleraine; and where Montefibre now intends to produce this.

Dr. Boyson: The development of the non-recrimped staple represented the introduction to Coleraine of the most modern processing technology that was available within the group. Montefibre had successfully developped this in its other European plants and logically extended the benefits of this work to Coleraine during 1984-85 after adapting the process to the particular equipment in Coleraine.

As the company first developed this processing technology in Italy and Spain, it will continue to use it in these plants.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement indicating what grant-aid was given in respect of the development of the three new products at Montefibre, Coleraine.

Dr. Boyson: The company had applied to the Industrial Development Board for support on the development of plastic reinforced fibre; on the development of a new optic fibre and on the development of non-recrimped staple. However, the programme for the development of these new products at Coleraine was not complete in respect of any of the products at the time the closure was announced.

The following table gives the financial details:

	Expenditure approved by the group £	Grant support approved by IDB £	Grants paid by IDB £
Plastic reinforced fibre	912,700	350,405	240,906
New optic fibre	691,980	278,970	59,399
Non-recrimped staple	120,000	41,740	20,490

As the company has announced the closure of the Coleraine plant it is liable to repay grants which were received for research and development projects.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement outlining what figures are available to indicate the return Montefibre earned on its investment in the Coleraine plant.

Dr. Boyson: The audited results for the 30 months ended 31 December 1985 show an accumulated loss of £92,000 was sustained by Montefibre on its Coleraine operations. For the 12-month period to 31 December 1985 the audited results show a loss of £858,000.

Renal Services

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his policy on the provision of renal services with particular reference to the question of satellite dialysis units in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: The Government wish to see renal services in Northern Ireland improved and I was pleased recently to be able to announce the allocation of additional funds for 1986-87 which will enable the expansion of dialysis and transplant services. I intend to announce shortly specific targets for the development of services for patients suffering from end stage renal failure including plans for the provision of a satellite dialysis unit in the area of the Western health and social services board.

PRIME MINISTER

Israel (Visit)

Mr. Marlow asked the Prime Minister what is her intention with regard to contact with Palestinians and visits to the occupied territories during her visit to Israel.

The Prime Minister: Arrangements are not yet firm. I hope to meet leading Palestinians as well as Israelis during my visit.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Science Budget

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what amount of the science budget is used for the purpose of defraying (a) superannuation payments, (b) costs of restructuring research councils and (c) for meeting variations in the exchange rate on international subscriptions.

Mr. Walden: The information requested is given for 1985-86:

	£ million
Science Budget 1985-86	583·9
Amount of Science Budget used for:
(a) Superannuation payments	19·9
(b) Restructuring costs	11·0
(c) Meeting variations (subsequent to the submission of Estimates) in the exchange rate on international subscriptions	1·15

Health Promotion Research Trust

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report a list of the grants made in association with his Department or a research council by the Health Promotion Research Trust.

Mr. Walden: The Medical Research Council's epidemiology unit is currently receiving grant support of nearly £65,000 from the Health Promotion Research Trust for a project involving the study of the relationship between beliefs, values, behaviour and ischaemic heart disease. No grants are made jointly by the trust and the Department, or the trust and any research council.

Workers Educational Association

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is yet in a position to respond to the request submitted by the general secretary of the Workers Educational Association for additional financial assistance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: I have written today on behalf of my right hon. Friend to inform the WEA that we have agreed to make available a further £55,500 in the current financial year specifically to assist WEA districts with the financial adjustments necessary to enable them to move towards greater cost-effectiveness.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police National Computer

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the present criteria for weeding the criminal names index of the police national computer and records of criminal convictions held by the national identification bureau; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: The weeding criteria have recently been changed so as to reduce substantially the number of criminal records held centrally without significantly impairing police effectiveness.

The previous criteria which were given in detail in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 28 June 1985, at columns 523-24, required records of those who had committed a single minor offence to be kept until the offender was 40 years old and records for those who had committed more than one offence to be kept until they were 70 years old. Under the new criteria these age limits are removed and records will be weeded where offenders have not come to notice for 20 years since the last conviction, whatever the number of convictions before that. This will result in the deletion of a large number of names and records of people who have committed more than one offence in their youth, who have not re-offended for 20 years but whose records would otherwise have been kept until they were 70 years old. Records will not be deleted, however, if they include evidence of mental illness or indecency, custodial sentences of more than six months, or offences of homicide.

Transport Staff (Attacks)

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the level of violent attacks upon transport staff in London.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have received one letter about attacks on public transport staff in London; since 1982 nine letters have been received not confined to the position in London. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) the then Home Secretary, met a delegation of the Transport and General Workers Union in October 1984 to discuss this matter.

Mr. Muhammad Idrish

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date Mr. Muhammad Idrish, Home

Office reference J137550/44, was asked to submit his passport to immigration authorities for the endorsement of his right to remain in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: On 25 November 1985, when I wrote to the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape), who had taken up the case.

Data Protection

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to commission an interim report from the Data Protection Registrar on the effect of the operation of the Data Protection Act on business, particularly small firms, pending the 1987 review; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The Data Protection Registrar has been asked to make a report after the Act has come fully into force in November 1987. He has said that he will report earlier if that seems practical and helpful.

Immigration

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many immigration cases were referred to him by right hon. and hon. Members in the last quarter of 1985 and so far in 1986; and of that number, how many have been kept in detention;

(2) how many immigration cases were referred to him by right hon. and hon. Members in 1983, 1984 and 1985; and, of that number, how many were kept in detention in each of those years.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 17 February, c. 47]: The available information relates to the number of immigration files* created following representations by right hon. and hon. Members, and is as follows:

	Number
1983	11,456
1984	13,164
1985	16,024

From October 1985 to 21 February 1986, 7,259 such files were created.

No figures are available of the number of people who were held in detention when the representations were received.

Notes:*

1. These figures include a small number of letters dealing with general immigration issues rather than individual cases.
2. Representations made on behalf of a single family may be counted as more than one case where the immigration circumstances of more than one member of the family are under consideration.
3. Further representations made after a reply has been sent are included separately in these figures.
4. Representations received about the same case from more than one right hon. or hon. Member are counted separately.
5. The figures include representations on after entry cases as well as on those arising at the ports.

SCOTLAND

Agricultural Colleges

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the scale of the proposed cut in public funding for the advisory services of the Scottish agricultural colleges in 1986-87.

Mr. John MacKay: No reduction in the public funding of the advisory services provided by the Scottish agricultural colleges is planned for 1986-87.

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his policy towards the proposal that the three Scottish agricultural colleges should be combined within a unified structure, with particular reference to the financial arrangements if any one of the colleges were to remain outside the proposed new structure.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 13 March 1986, c. 550]: As indicated in the consultation paper on the agricultural advisory services in Scotland, issued by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland, Ministers support the proposal by the Council of Scottish Agricultural Colleges to form a new company which would have overall responsibility for the management of all the services provided by the three Scottish agricultural colleges.

The colleges have yet to finalise on the proposal; it is premature therefore to speculate on how the detailed arrangements, including those relating to funding, might apply in different circumstances, whatever these may be.

Youth Employment

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide a breakdown of the numbers of young people aged 16 to 18 years (a) in full-time education, (b) in employment, (c) unemployed and (d) on a YTS.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Figures indicating the number of young people aged 16 to 18 in each of the categories for which information is requested are not available on a comparable basis. The figures for Scotland given in the table below, which are the latest available in each case, come from different sources and relate to different points in time. There is therefore an inevitable and unquantifiable element of double counting. For example, many of the young people in full-time education in 1984 also feature in the numbers shown as unemployed or in YTS in early 1986.

	(1) Full-time Education	(2) Employ-ment	(3) Unem-ployed	(4) YTS
Age 16	55,673	32,000	12,780
Age 17	28,974	45,000	17,645	31,746
Age 18	18,905	49,000	19,098
Total	103,552	126,000	49,523	31,746

Col. (1) Figures as at September 1984 (schools and colleges) and 31 December 1984 (universities).

Col. (2) Figures are extracted from the 1984 Labour Force Survey and are estimates.

Col. (3) Position as at 9 January 1986, the latest date for which age band figures are available.

Col. (4) Position at end of February 1986. An age breakdown is not currently available.

District Heating

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to how many local authority dwellings are served by district heating.

Mr. Ancram: This information is not held centrally.

Teachers' Pay

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Government will make additional resources available for teachers' pay in Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind: As I announced last week I will set up an independent inquiry into teachers' pay and other matters. The inquiry will be free to make whatever recommendations it sees fit, having heard the evidence put to it. Meantime the Government have given no new commitment to make additional resources available; when the inquiry has reported its recommendations will be considered in full.

TRANSPORT

Railway Accidents

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Transport what factors he took into account in deciding not to order a public inquiry into the recent railway accident in Barnetby, South Humberside.

Mr. David Mitchell: There was no loss of life or injury; the situation created by the derailment was quickly and correctly contained by the emergency services and British Railways; there was confidence that the cause of the accident could be established; and that local people could have full information about the accident and about measures to prevent a recurrence by means other than a full public inquiry.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Transport what factors he took into account in deciding to order a public inquiry into the recent railway accident in Derbyshire.

Mr. David Mitchell: The accident on 9 March at Chinley in Derbyshire was attended by loss of life and serious injury. There have been other accidents involving passenger trains in the area during recent years. In the circumstances, and in view of early information available to the Railway Inspectorate as to the possible cause of this latest accident, a public inquiry was deemed appropriate and necessary.

Bus Passes

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport what guidance he has issued to second tier authorities about the effect of the Transport Act 1985 on their provision of bus passes for pensioners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: My Department, acting jointly with the Departments of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, will very shortly be publishing guidance on the provision of concessionary fare schemes under the Transport Act 1985 addressed to all authorities with public transport responsibilities.

Sea Birds

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many incidents affecting sea birds have been referred to the wildlife incidents units in each of the last five years.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My Department receives reports of oil pollution at sea and those which mention oiled sea birds are referred to the Nature Conservancy Council. During 1985 my Department received 102 reports of oil pollution at sea, of which only one was so referred. Figures for previous years are not readily available.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Polyurethane Foam

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the present percentage of polyurethane foam that is allowed to be used in furniture and textile manufacture; and what plans he has to seek to reduce its use.

Mr. Howard: There are no regulations concerning the percentage or amount of polyurethane foam allowed to be used in the manufacture of domestic furniture and furnishings. The Upholstered Furniture (Safety) Regulations require furniture to resist ignition by a smouldering cigarette and, if labelled resistant, ignition by a match flame. I have no plans as such for reduction in the use of polyurethane foam as a filling material in upholstered furniture and there are as yet no entirely satisfactory replacement materials. However, I am aware of the widespread concern about the behaviour of this material in fires. The Government have funded research aimed at improving the fire resistance of furniture including investigation into alternative filling materials and treatments to reduce the emission of toxic fumes. But it would be wrong to imagine that replacement of polyurethane foam with materials which produce less smoke and fumes when burning would solve the whole problem of fires involving furniture. Resistance to ignition and reduction of the rate of flame spread are equally if not more important; I am at present considering making new or revised regulations or approved standards for resistance to ignition of both upholstered furniture and beds and mattresses.

ECGD (Bank Guarantee)

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many letters he has received concerning the proposed closure of the Export Credits Guarantee Department's comprehensive bank guarantee facilities; and if he will give full details of the losses and the reasons why they have been incurred.

Mr. Alan Clark: Seventy exporters or their representatives have written about the proposed closure of ECGD's comprehensive bank guarantee. Some have written more than one letter. It is not possible to put a precise figure on the Department's final losses on the facility because ECGD does not become aware of the final loss under its guarantee often for several years, when the extent of any subsequent recoveries becomes known. The cumulative cash deficit at the end of 1985 was over £70 million. Loss under the facility occurs when an exporter fails to repay the finance advanced by his bank which has been guaranteed by ECGD, and ECGD is unable to recover its payment to the bank because, for instance, the exporter has become insolvent.

English Estates (Report and Accounts)

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the normal date for publication of English Estates' annual report and accounts; and why the report and accounts for 1984-85 have not yet been published.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

British Shipbuilders

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the latest progress on privatising the interests of British Shipbuilders.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Secretary of State has given his consent to British Shipbuilders for the sale of Hall Russell Ltd. to Aberdeen Shipbuilders Ltd. The terms of sale, net of purchase consideration and other aspects of the transaction, represent a cost to British Shipbuilders of not more than £1·6 million. British Shipbuilders has also accepted a limited contingent liability in the event of redundancies. This is considerably less than the cost of closing the yard.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

UNESCO

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer on 6 February, Official Report, column 332, which Community countries made representations at official level against the United Kingdom leaving the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation.

Mr. Eggar: France and Germany.

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will estimate the level of expenditure per annum by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation in the United Kingdom, and the extent to which it is likely to be reduced by the decision to withdraw from that organisation.

Mr. Eggar: Details provided by UNESCO show that total purchases in 1985 amounted to about $2·8 million. It is up to UNESCO itself to decide how much to spend in the future. There is nothing in UNESCO's constitution or regulations which prevents it from purchasing in a non-member state.

Foreign Diplomats

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what guidelines exist governing the involvement in the management or direction of United Kingdom companies of foreign diplomats based in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Article 42 of the Vienna convention on diplomatic relations states that a diplomat shall not in the receiving state practise for personal profit any professional or commercial activity. We expect diplomats here to comply with this article.

Diplomats (Private Education Costs)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 10 March, Official Report, column 362, if he will now give the information originally requested for each of the last 10 years relating to the number of diplomatic personnel who receive assistance under his Department's scheme for help with defraying the costs of private education for their children; and if he will now also give the breakdown originally requested in relation to the same staff.

Mr. Eggar: The total cost to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office of providing boarding school allowance for the financial years 1975-76 to 1984-85 was as follows:

1975-76	3,135,401
1976-77	3,512,229
1977-78	3,358,337
1978-79	3,790,371
1979-80	4,011,280
1980-81	4,962,267
1981-82	5,663,088
1982-83	7,465,177
1983-84	5,940,981
1984-85	6,239,908

The reply given to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist), on 28 October 1985, at column 359, on the figures from 1979-80 explained the exceptional nature of the 1982-83 figure.

The number of employees in receipt of boarding school allowance from 1983 is as follows:

	Number
March 1983	864
March 1984	860
March 1985	839

Figures for earlier years were not collated and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Costs of fares for children's journeys since 1977 are as follows:

1977-78	830,594
1978-79	789,212
1979-80	925,660
1980-81	995,424
1981-82	1,129,908
1982-83	1,215,928
1983-84	1,155,819
1984-85	1,005,303

Costs of fares of children from 1975-78 were not collated separately from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's total travel costs.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Dr. Cunningham asked the Paymaster General if he will publish the total number of people in employment in each non-metropolitan county, metropolitan county and the Greater London area in April of each year from 1975 to 1985 showing the percentage change from year to year, and the overall percentage change from 1975 to 1985.

Mr. Lang: The available information is as follows and relates to June each year from 1975 to 1978, when censuses of employment were taken. For the Greater London area, figures for periods since 1981 are derived from employment estimates based on small-scale sample inquiries which do not produce reliable results for smaller areas. More up to date employment estimates for the other areas under inquiry will become available following publication of the 1984 census of employment results later this year.

Mrs. Peacock asked the Paymaster General how many people in Batley and Spen have been employed for (a) more than six months, (b) more than one year and (c) more than two years.

Mr. Lang: On 9 January 1986, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, the numbers of claimants in the Batley and Spen parliamentary constituency who had been unemployed for more than six months, one year, and two years were 3,134, 2,188 and 1,335 respectively. This information is in the Library.

Community Programme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General if he will list the dates and nature of the changes in eligibility rules for the community programme since its inception and the effect on the number of people eligible immediately prior to and subsequent to these changes.

Mr. Lang: Since the inception of the community programme in October 1982 there have been two main changes of relevance. In November 1982 priority for entry was given to those aged 18 to 24 who have been unemployed for six of the last nine months and those aged 25 or over who have been unemployed for 12 of the last 15 months. In addition, all applicants must have been unemployed continuously for two months prior to entering the programme. From October 1984 those qualifying for priority entry were also required to be in personal or indirect receipt of an appropriate state benefit.

It is not possible to state the precise effect of these changes on numbers.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General what has been the level of the community programme allowance in each year since it began; what percentage rises these represent year-on-year; and what have been the corresponding rises in the retail prices index and in average earnings.

Mr. Lang: The community programme was introduced on 1 October 1982 and replaced the community enterprise programme. Under the programme, workers are paid the locally agreed hourly rate for the job, not an allowance. The reimbursable wages of workers (except managers and supervisors) were subject to a maximum average of £60 per week until the end of September 1984. From October 1984 the average has been £63 per week, which represents an increase of 5 per cent.

The corresponding percentage rises in the retail prices index, and in average earnings since the introduction of the community programme in October 1982 were as follows:

	Retail price Per cent.	Average earnings Per cent.
October 1982 to October 1983	+5·0	+8·7
October 1983 to October 1984	+5·0	+8·2
October 1984 to October 1985	+5·4	+6·0
October 1985 to January 1986	+0·6	+2·2

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General how many places have been available in each year since the community programme began; how many of these have been filled; and what has been (a) the gross cost and (b) the net cost after benefit savings of the programme, at constant prices, based on its first year of operation.

Mr. Lang: The community programme was introduced on 1 October 1982 and replaced the community enterprise programme.

Initially funds were made available to provide for 130,000 filled places. In March 1985 the programme was expanded by a further 100,000 places, and the target figure now stands at 230,000 filled places to be achieved by the end of May 1986.

The number of filled places at the end of each year since 1982 are as follows:

March	Filled places
1983	39,100
1984	134,400
1985	161,400

The gross cost and net cost after benefit savings of the programme, at constant 1982-83 prices, its first year of operation are as follows:

	Gross costs £ million	Net cost (after benefit savings) £ million
1982-83*	177	†115
1983-84	381	250
1984-85	486	330
1985-86‡	605	405

* Includes expenditure on community enterprise programme.
† Not calculated separately, but assumed to be equivalent to 65 per cent. of gross costs as in 1983-84.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General if he will list the number of people recorded as in training on the YTS for each month since its inception showing separately for each month the contemporary figure available immediately, as provided in the progress report for the Youth Training Board, and the latest available figure as revised by the Spectrum system, indicating which figures are now definitive.

Mr. Trippier: The figures requested are given in the table. The figures in the right-hand column are definitive for 1983-84 and are the latest available from April 1984.

The contemporary monthly figures are subject to revision as late notifications are received of young people joining and leaving YTS. As delays in notifying leavers tend to be greater than delays in notifying entrants, the contemporary monthly figures are generally higher than the revised numbers.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Public Expenditure

Mr. Straw asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report his estimate of the likely total gross increase in public expenditure and in the public sector borrowing requirement of the proposals contained in the document "Giving More Help Where the Need is Greatest", published by the Tory Reform Group, together with his estimate of the likely additional jobs created.

Mr. MacGregor: I have made no such estimates.

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out for 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively, and estimate for 1985, the budget for 1986 and estimated outturn for 1986 both in cash and real terms (a) total community expenditure, (b) community expenditure excluding rebates and administrative and institutional costs, (c) agricultural expenditure and (d) (c) as a percentage of (b).

Mr. Brooke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Income Tax

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the percentage change in income tax liability for each income range in 1985-86 compared with the 1978-79 tax regime adjusted for price movements over the period.

Mr. Moore: The table shows the percentage reductions in tax liability calculated for the 1985-86 tax regime compared with the 1978-79 regime indexed to 1985-86 levels by reference to the statutory formula. The estimates have been calculated on the 1985-86 tax base.

Economic and Finance Ministers (Meeting)

Mr. Knowles asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the latest meeting of the European Community's Council of Economic and Finance Ministers.

Mr. Brooke: The EC Economic and Finance Council met in Brussels on 10 March. I represented the United Kingdom.

The Council considered a report by the European Court of Auditors on the 1984 Community budget, which was introduced by the president of the court. I underlined the need for continued vigilance to ensure effective implementation of Community spending and prevention of fraud.

The Council had a preliminary discussion of the application of budgetary discipline to the 1987 Community budget. It is intended to set the formal reference framework at the Council's meeting on 28 April.

The Council reviewed the economic situation in the Community.

The Council had a discussion on international debt, on the basis of a report from the Monetary Committee. The report, which emphasises the importance of continuing the case by case approach to debt problems, was generally endorsed by the Council.

The Council's agenda included also a possible Community mandate for OECD discussions on tied aid financing for exports, and tax measures to encourage co-operation between undertakings in different member states. These matters will be taken forward at future Councils.

Revenue

Mr. Frank Field asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the proportion of Government revenue raised by (a) direct and (b) indirect taxes for each of the past 20 years.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986, c. 390]: The proportion of Government revenue raised by direct and indirect taxes is as follows:

THE ARTS

Museums and Galleries

Mr. Latham asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a further statement about the present arrangements for loans from national museums and galleries for which he is responsible to local collections.

Mr. Luce: Six of the nine national collections which regularly lend works of art for exhibition are continuing to do so without requiring commercial insurance by the borrower.

A fresh formula has now been devised which I hope will overcome the anxieties of the other three national collections. Discussions are now proceeding on the new formula with the Tate gallery and others and I hope to reach an early solution.

Tax Settlements

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will list, giving the relevant references in the Official Report, those occasions on which the amounts of estate duty or capital transfer tax satisfied by the acceptance of objects or land in respect of individual cases have been specified in written answers during the period between the financial year 1976-77 and 1984-85.

Mr. Luce [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986. c. 359]: The Minister for the Arts assumed responsibility for acceptances in lieu of tax with the passing of the National Heritage Act 1980. Prior to this responsibility rested with the Treasury.

Announcements of such acceptances in the periods April 1980 to March 1985, indicating the estate duty or capital transfer tax satisfied, were made on the following dates:

27 October 1980 Col. 696
3 April 1981 Col. 695
7 December 1981 Statement laid before the House
7 April 1982 Col. 355
22 October 1982 Col. 214
12 May 1983 Statement laid before the House
6 April 1984 Col. 697
2 April 1985 Col. 577

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts what steps he took to verify the accuracy of the information in relation to the dates of recommendations by the Museums and Galleries Commission for acceptances in satisfaction of tax on which his answer of 26 February, Official Report, column 593, was based, and if he now has anything to add to that answer.

Mr. Luce [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986, c. 359-60]: The dates were correctly given on the basis of information provided by the Museums and Galleries Commission.

In the case of the Kedleston photographs the recommendation from the commission related to a condition of acceptance that the photographs be kept in the India Office library. Ownership was transferred to the British Library for the India Office library in May 1985 and the allocation was announced in answer to the hon. Member's question of 4 July 1985.

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts if he will specify, giving the relevant references in the Official Report, the occasions on which it has been stated to the House since 1979 and prior to his answer to the hon. Member for Warley, East of 26 February, Official Report, c. 593, that the amounts of estate duty or capital transfer tax satisfied by the acceptance of objects or land is confidential in respect of individual cases.

Mr. Luce [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986, c. 360]: The answer to the hon. Member's question on 26 February was the first occasion on which it was stated in the House that the amounts of estate duty or capital transfer tax satisfied by acceptance of objects or land were confidential in individual cases.

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts why, in the light of his answers of 13 February, Official Report, column 502, and 26 February, Official Report, column 593, indicating that £505,650 had been accounted for out of a total original provision of £2 million in respect of items of heritage quality accepted in lieu of tax, it was necessary to increase the cash limit on class V, vote 10 in relation to expenditure under subhead C2; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986, c. 360]: The cash limit on class V, vote 10 was increased as the consequence of a call on the public expenditure reserve in accordance with Lord Gowrie's statement of 26 July 1985. This was to enable the Government to accept certain offers in lieu of tax about which I hope to make an announcement shortly when arrangements between the parties have been completed.

Works of Art (Exports)

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts if he will state for each year since 1979 the length of time which elapsed between the end of the year to which successive reports of the Reviewing Committee on the Export of Works of Art related and the publications of the relevant reports to what factors he attributes the length of these periods and the trend shown by them; and what steps he is taking to reduce the time taken to publish these reports.

Mr. Luce [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986, c. 360]: The reports of the reviewing committee refer to the year running from 1 July to 30 June. Recent publication dates are as follows:

Reporting year	Date of publication	Time from end of reporting year
1979-80	May 1981	11 months
1980-81	March 1982	9 months
1981-82	March 1983	9 months
1982-83	March 1984	9 months
1983-84	June 1985	12 months

These figures do not illustrate any particular trend, but the case load of the reviewing committee has in that time increased substantially, although its staffing has not. I am conscious of the desirability of prompt publication, notwithstanding other pressures, and the secretariat is continuing to do its best to reduce the publication time despite its increased workload.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the volume and potential of known Russian and Soviet bloc nuclear weapons; how this compares with that of the West; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) on 11 March, at column 424.

Disciplinary Proceedings (Pension Rights)

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will state the number of cases in the last five years of which he is aware in which disciplinary proceedings against a member of the armed forces led, wholly or partially, to the deprivation of pension rights.

Mr. Lee: Separate statistics are not maintained. However, I am aware of 11 cases in the period 1981 to 1985 inclusive in which pensions due for immediate payment have been forfeited or reduced below the rates applicable to normal or premature retirement.

Water Cannons

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what occasions water cannons have been present at Greenham common air base; under whose authority; for what purposes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley At no time have water cannons been deployed at RAF Greenham common.

Cars and Trucks (Replacement)

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Defence if BL was invited to bid for all replacements of cars and trucks required by Her Majesty's forces in the financial years 1982-83 to date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: I can confirm that British Leyland has had full opportunity to compete for the services' foreseen requirements for new cars and trucks over the period mentioned. Orders have additionally gone to the appropriate manufacturers to replace existing vehicles which have been disposed of on grounds of age and mileage. Land Rover has, of course, been the sole source of supply for the services' extensive fleet in the ½ tonne and ¾ tonne range: and other BL products in the fleet include Metros (saloon and van) and the Sherpa utility. The company is currently competing actively for the services' requirements for a new 4-tonne truck as well as other specialised logistic vehicles. The Department will be considering appropriate BL models later this year for its grade A and B staff car requirements.

Kneller Hall (Valuation)

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the extent of the error made by the Property Services Agency in the July 1985 estimate given to his Department of the value of Kneller Hall, Twickenham; and if he will now publish in the Official Report the correct figures in tabular form.

Mr. Lee: In estimating the disposal value of Kneller Hall the Property Services Agency overstated the value by £2·3 million because it had included the disposal value of the associated married quarters and mistakenly told the Ministry of Defence that the new figure was for the Kneller Hall site excluding married quarters.

The disposal value of Kneller Hall is currently being reassessed as part of the wider reappraisal of the options for training service musicians announced by my noble Friend the Minister of State for Defence Support in another place on 12 February 1986.

Strategic Defence Initiative

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether Mr. Clarence Robinson and his team of United States consultants sought clearance from his Department to discuss the classification of strategic defence initiative-related research with United Kingdom companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I have nothing to add to my reply to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on 6 March 1986, at column 266.

Royal Dockyards

Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current level of company interest in the Government's plans for the future management of the royal dockyards at Devonport and Rosyth.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Responses to the pre-qualification questionnaire issued by my Department to companies interested in the Government's plans to introduce commercial management into the royal dockyards at Devonport and Rosyth have now been received and evaluated. We shall be inviting the consortium of Trafalgar House, Plessey and A and P Appledore and the management-led company Devonport Dockyard Limited to tender for the contract to manage and operate Devonport dockyard. Invitations to tender for the Rosyth contract will be sent to the Babcock International-Thorn-EMI consortium, the Balfour Beatty-Weir Group consortium, Press Offshore and Northern Engineering Industries.

A number of other companies — Foster Wheeler, Vickers SEL, Taylor Woodrow, Tyne Shiprepair, MEL and Cossor — retain an interest in bidding for the contracts, but have indicated that they would need to form partnerships for this purpose. Any consortia formed from these companies will be required to pre-qualify, as will any new companies which come forward.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Patient Services

Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans health authorities have for developing services to patients in the coming year.

Mr. Fowler: As part of our arrangements for management of the National Health Service, we now require health authorities every year to draw up short-term programmes. These programmes set out their plans for developing services in the coming year. I have now approved these plans for 1986-87. They show that health authorities are planning significant expansion in services. They will treat more patients, make available more advanced forms of treatment and continue the progress already being made towards caring for people in the community.

The plans are further evidence of the Government's commitment to the National Health Service and build on the progress made in recent years. Since 1978-79 an extra 17·5 per cent. in real terms has already been provided for hospital and community health services. In the coming year an extra £650 million (6·7 per cent.) is being provided against forecast general inflation of 4·5 per cent.

In addition, the steps we have taken to improve management are now beginning to pay off. Health authorities are planning to generate cash savings of £150 million through a wide variety of value-for-money measures. The measures include energy conservation, better management of supplies and competitive tendering for support services. All the £150 million saved will be retained by health authorities.

Health authorities will also be making better use of manpower. Overall numbers are unlikely to change much, but there will be an increase in staff working directly with patients, and most of these will be nurses.

The progress being made in developing the service can be illustrated in three ways. First, total capital spending will be over £900 million compared with £365 million in 1978-79. Next year's figure includes an estimated £130 million of receipts from the sales of land and property, which health authorities will be able to retain. A number of new hospitals will be opened. For example, in the autumn the brand new Bromsgrove and Redditch district general hospital will open at a cost of £24 million, providing a wide range of acute, psychiatric, geriatric and other services. And in the coming year Mersey region will be investing in a major new district general hospital for Southport.

Secondly, we shall continue the move towards community care for the mentally handicapped and other groups of patients. This means, for example, that in northern region by July 1986 only four children will still be in mental handicap hospitals and in South East Thames region no children will be remaining in such hospitals by March 1987. In Oxford the outdated Bradwell Grove mental handicap hospital will be closed allowing the staff to be deployed to care for people in community units.

Thirdly, all regions are also planning important developments in their acute services. They expect the total number of patients treated to rise significantly, and to make progress in the provision of priority services. For example, coronary artery surgery and renal dialysis will be expanded; more hip and joint replacement operations will be done; and a children's bone marrow transplant unit will open in Bristol.

Life Expectancy

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services to what factors he attributes the relatively greater increase in life expectancy for females as compared with males at age 15 years over the period 1953 to 1983.

Mr. Ray Whitney: Examination of age-specific mortality rates for males and females for 1953 and 1983 at ages 15 and over shows that there is a major difference in ischaemic heart disease mortality for the two sexes. Particularly at ages 40 to 44 and 65 to 69 inclusive, the rates rose appreciably for males over the 30-year period, while they fell for females (or rose to a small extent for three of the age-groups).

Because of the major contribution that ischaemic heart disease makes to all cause mortality, the difference in trend in death rates from this condition is reflected in the relatively greater increase in the expectation of life for females compared with males.

Health and Social Services

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing separately for (i) hospital and community health services, (ii) family practitioner services and (iii) social services, actual and planned expenditure in England for the years 1978-79 to 1988-1989 in (a) cash prices, (b) cost terms and (c) volume terms, showing the percentage increases over 1978-79, on a basis consistent with Table 2.12 of Cmnd. 9702-II.

Mr. Hayhoe: The following tables contain the information that the hon. Member requested. Since expenditure is given net of patient charges in table 2.12 of Cmnd. 9702-II, the expenditure figures are given on a net basis. Actual expenditure figures may differ from planned as a result of transfers between revenue and capital expenditure. The expenditure figures also exclude current and capital expenditure on central health and miscellaneous services. Pay and price indices specific to health and personal social services expenditure programmes are not available for 1985-86, nor for the public expenditure planning period.

Local Authorities (Grants)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all specific type grants paid by his Department to local authorities, showing the size of each grant, which were hypothecated to any individual service or services or where local authorities had to bid for specific grants.

Mr. Whitney: The following grants were paid by the Department in 1984-85:

a. to reimburse local authorities' administration and benefit expenditure under the housing benefits scheme. For administration expenditure the grant is 60 per cent. of total reasonable costs for authorities in England (65 per cent. in Scotland, 70 per cent. in Wales). Payments to authorities amounted to £78 million. For benefit costs the grant is 100·6 per cent. of expenditure on certificated benefit and 90 per cent. of expenditure on standard benefit. Authorities received £4 billion. These sums are subject to adjustment on final audit;

b. to cover the cost of approved projects to provide secure accommodation for children in care in England (£1 million).

In addition, payments are made where local authorities undertake work for the Department on an agency basis. The largest of these are for the accommodation of children who have been convicted of serious crimes (£1·5 million), and for the provision of milk to children attending day nurseries or playgroups (this is paid to local authorities and other organisations, total payments were £3 million).

Smoking

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are his policies and priorities regarding support for research on tobacco-related diseases; what recent representations he has received on this subject; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: We support research which will assist in reducing the ill effects of tobacco usage on the health of the nation. A priority is to establish methods of assisting people not to smoke or to smoke less dangerously. Studies include investigations of why children smoke, methods of smoking cessation, the role of smoking in heart disease, respiratory disorders and pregnancy, and investigations of the effects on health of changes in the tar, nicotine, and carbon monoxide yields of cigarettes. Research in this field is co-ordinated by the Independent Scientific Committee on Smoking and Health, the Department's Committee into Behavioural Aspects of Smoking and Health, the Health Education Council and Action on Smoking and Health. In addition, the Medical Research Council has recently formed a smoking research review committee. Representations on this subject have recently been received from a number of bodies including the Royal College of Physicians and the British Medical Association.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, as part of his new agreement with the tobacco industries, if he will make it his policy to seek the continuance of the Health Promotion Research Trust; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The Health Promotion Research Trust does not figure in the discussions leading to a new voluntary agreement on the advertising and promotion of tobacco products.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many meetings he has now had with tobacco companies to discuss health warnings; which specific companies he has met; and what agreements have been reached.

Mr. Whitney: Eight meetings with the tobaccoindustry, represented by the Tobacco Advisory Council, have been held at ministerial or official level to discuss the voluntary agreement on advertising, promotion and health warnings in respect of tobacco products. We hope to announce the outcome shortly.

Nurses

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of trainee or student nurses who have in the last year not been offered a nursing job within four weeks of the conclusion of their nurses' training; if he will name the district health authorities involved; and if he will give the equivalent figures for each of the last five years.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not collected centrally.

Griffiths Report

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many nursing adviser posts have been terminated in each regional health authority since the implementation of the proposals of the Griffiths report.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on 13 March at column 567. With the introduction of the general management function every health authority is required to appoint a chief nursing adviser to advise the authority and its managers on professional nursing matters; and also to monitor professional nursing standards within the authority.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many personnel officer posts have been created in each regional health authority since the implementation of the proposals of the Griffiths report.

Mr. Hayhoe: The post of personnel officer was common throughout the Health Service before the implementation of the Griffiths report proposals. I regret that information about the number of personnel officer posts created since implementation of the Griffiths report proposals is not held centrally.

Board and Lodging Allowances

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions he has had with representatives of private charities about the effect on young people under 26 of limits on board and lodgings allowances; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have met a number of interested voluntary bodies to discuss the boarder changes affecting younger claimants since proposals were first brought forward in November 1984 and we shall continue to maintain this contact.

Elderly People (Residential Homes)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he intends to discuss with representatives of health authorities sharing with local authorities the cost of accommodating elderly people in local authority homes or in local authority-financed places in private homes.

Mr. Whitney: People in residential care homes should not normally require a more intensive degree of health care than that which is already provided in such homes by primary health care teams, and a health authority contribution to accommodation costs would not therefore be appropriate. If, however, the hon. Member has a particular proposal in mind, perhaps she would write to me.

Ageusic-anosmic Condition

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the number of people known to be suffering from ageusic-anosmic condition; and whether he will detail current research into it assisted by funds from his Department.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that we have no reliable estimates of the number of people who are ageusic and anosmic, that is who suffer from a loss of the senses of taste and smell. On research, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) on 11 March, at column 442.

Volunteer Development Workers

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he will introduce legislation to allow volunteer development workers to become entitled to unemployment benefit when they return to the United Kingdom after a period of service abroad.

Mr. Newton: I am pleased to announce that I have today laid before the House the Social Security (Contributions) Amendment Regulations 1986 which introduce a special voluntary national insurance contribution which can be paid by volunteer development workers. I have also laid before the House the Social Security Benefit (Persons Abroad) Amendment Regulations 1986 which will allow the special volunteer development workers contribution to be included when unemployment benefit entitlement is being calculated.

Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many responses he has had to his Department's consultation paper on the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill from organisations of and for disabled people; if he will list the organisations concerned; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 7 March 1986, c. 321]: Forty four responses have been received from organisations of and for disabled people, which are listed as follows. These comments together with those received from other bodies, including professional organisations and the local authority associations are now being considered.

ENVIRONMENT

House of Commons (Static Electricity)

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how often the carpets within the House and surrounding working areas are sprayed to prevent the excessive build-up of static electricity.

Sir George Young: The carpets are sprayed with anti-static fluid as and when the problem occurs, and also on request. During the recent sustained spell of dry and cold weather which has lowered the humidity in the House nearly 1,000 sq m have been treated throughout the Palace. The advent of warmer, damper weather should reduce the problem.

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to seek to cure the problem of excess static electricity within the bounds of the House.

Sir George Young: There are no easy or cheap solutions. Certain areas within the House, including the Chamber, have humidity control which mitigates the build-up of static electricity. The cost of providing permanent or temporary humidity control in all the other carpeted areas would be prohibitively expensive.

Water Supplies

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those water supply zones in which the maximum admissible concentration for aluminium of 0·2 milligrams per litre is exceeded on the basis of a three-monthly average.

Mr. John Patten: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Macfarlane) on 10 June 1985, at columns 319-20.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of the geographical areas covered by those water supplies in respect of which applications for derogation from the maximum admissible concentrations have been made by the Thames water authority and the Welsh water authority; and if he will indicate which of these applications for derogations have been refused.

Mr. John Patten: Applications for derogation have been made by Thames water authority for the following water supply zones:

Putney-Fulham, Maiden Lane-Kentish Town, Streatham Hill, High Beech, Woodford-Canning Town, Chessington, and Finsbury Park-Mile End in London for the nitrite parameter; Banbury and Abingdon in Oxfordshire for the parameter which includes chlorinated trihalomethanes.

None of these applications has been refused as there is no public health risk.

That part of the question relating to the Welsh water authority is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Vehicle Emissions (Research)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list any research projects he is funding, has funded or intends to fund on the potential for increased environmental hazard from vehicle emissions with respect to traffic flow changes expected on the opening of the Channel tunnel.

Mrs. Rumbold: Research on the environmental effects of vehicle emissions is included in my Department's research programme. I see no need for projects specifically related to traffic flow changes which may be occasioned by the Channel tunnel.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the availability of further financial assistance to certain shire counties following the rate support grant settlement.

Mrs. Rumbold: I announced on 12 February, at column 463, in response to a question from my hon.

Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves), that the total of block grant available in 1986-87 would be increased by £22 million following my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's decision to increase the rate of police grant for 1986-87 to 51 per cent. All police authorities, both in shire and metropolitan areas, will gain from this. On 5 March, at column 190, I announced, in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Sumberg), that I was formally guaranteeing that £500 million of grant would be recycled in 1986-87 to local authorities in grant.

Football Authorities

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what subjects he expects to discuss at his next meeting with representatives of the football authorities.

Mr. Tracey: No formal meeting is currently planned, but informal discussions take place frequently within the framework of our close co-operation with the football authorities on measures to combat hooliganism. The results this season are encouraging, but we will continue to review progress. In particular, we are discussing actions needed for the Mexico World Cup, on which I hope to make an announcement soon.

Devon and Cornwall (EC Aid)

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will indicate for the years 1975 to 1985 the total aid granted for projects in Devon and Cornwall separately by the European Community under the European regional development fund.

Mr. Tracey: Grant awarded for infrastructure projects is as follows:

	Cornwall £	Devon £
1975	10,875	6,660
1976	210,601	21,890
1977	nil	86,263
1978	212,716	175,494
1979	1,575,515	6,164,790
1980	205,350	54,600
1981	5,475,900	800,700
1982	2,595,000	3,330,900
1983	2,993,900	5,138,700
1984	10,582,291	16,307,220
1985	3,639,000	4,950,600

ERDF awards to industrial projects are the responsibility of the Department of Trade and Industry. Accurate annual records are not available. Since 1975, however, a total of £5·9 million has been awarded fo industrial projects in the south-west; about £4·4 million to Devon and about £1·5 million to Cornwall.

Local Government Finance

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the figures for (a) domestic rates rises and (b) retail prices index which underlie figure A6 on page 82 of Cmnd. 9714.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The figures are as follows:

1974-75	+27	+17·9
1975-76	+23	+24·6

Local Authorities (Grants)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all specific type grants paid by his Department to local authorities, showing the size of each grant, which were hypothecated to any individual service or services, or where local authorities had to bid for specific grants.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My Department pays specific grants to local authorities as set out in the table. The size of each grant is expressed as the forecast outturn payments in 1985-86.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of houses in each housing tenure have (a) loft insulation to the recommended thickness, (b) central heating, (c) cavity or solid wall insulation and (d) double glazing.

Sir George Young: The information requested is as follows:

Proportion of total number of houses in tenure group with:	Owner occupied	Local authority	Private rented
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
Loft insulation*
100mm or more	34	18	12
at least 75mm	55	36	21
at least 50mm	69	48	27
Central heating†	77	59	40
Wall Insulation‡ (cavity wall and solid)	12	10	5
Double glazing
more than 80 per cent. of glazing double glazing	42	5	11
some double glazing	15	1	1

* The recommended minimum thickness has varied with changes in the building regulations and also varies with the thermal properties of the insulation material concerned. It is now about 100mm.

† Central heating includes partial systems and electric storage heaters.

‡ Wall insulation is almost entirely cavity wall insulation.

All the data, with exception of the element of solid wall insulation, are derived from the audits of Great Britain survey undertaken at the end of 1984.

District Heating

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authority dwellings in England and Wales are served by district heating.

Sir George Young: This information is not available.

Home Insulation

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much was allocated to local authorities under the home insulation scheme in the 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 financial years; how much of this allocation was spent in each of those years; and how many homes were insulated.

Sir George Young: The information requested is as follows:

Homes insulation scheme	1982-83 £ million	1983-84 £ million	1984-85 £ million
Allocation to local authorities	32·8	31·9	31·5
Amount of allocation spent	*26·4	*22·2	*23·2
Homes insulated (thousands)	386,000	315,000	335,000

* These figures are provisional as final audited claims on which they are based are still outstanding from some local authorities.

Radiation Monitoring

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply given on 18 December 1985, Official Report, column 221, what records of radiation monitoring of dockers and seamen since 1955 are held by the health physics services group division of AERE, Harwell; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: For sea disposal operations carried out since 1961 the Harwell establishment of the UKAEA provided personal dosimeters to all dockers and crew members involved. Before this date only those expected to receive significant doses were issued with dosimeters.

Records of all monitored doses are held by Harwell, and will be for at least 50 years from the time that these doses were incurred. The results of dosimeter assessments were passed to the relevant employers (for example, the shipping line or the port authority) at the same time.

Housing Investment

Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received concerning public investment in housing.

Sir George Young: This subject is mentioned in a number of letters received by my Department and at meetings in which it takes part. There is no central record kept.

AGRICULTURE FISHERIES AND FOOD

Horse Auctions

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many times in 1985 inspectors of his Department visited horse auctions; and what reports were made.

Mr. Gummer: Inspectors of my Department visited premises where horses were sold by auction on 236 occasions in 1985, and reported as appropriate on their findings, particularly in relation to the level of compliance with the code of practice on the operation of horse markets issued by the Agriculture Departments in 1979.

Food Additives

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to the total number and types of food additives used in United Kingdom food manufacturing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: There are around 320 additives specifically approved for use in the United Kingdom. The use of flavours, enzymes and modified starches is also permitted within the general provisions of the Food Acts.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he plans any new initiatives relating to the use of additives in food; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The Food Advisory Committee and the Committee on Toxicity already keep under constant review the use of additives in food. Officials are considering ways in which food purchasers might be better and more accurately informed of the safeguards taken before additives are permitted.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will make a statement on the policy on the use of flavours, modified starches and enzymes in food manufacture, with special reference to the recommendations put to him by the Food Additives and Contaminants Committee;

(2) if he has any plans to introduce a positive permitted list for flavours, modified starches and enzymes in food manufacture.

Mr. Gummer: The use of flavours, modified starches and enzymes is permitted subject to the general provisions of the Food Act 1984. Proposals for European Community directives to control flavours and modified starches, more specifically, are under consideration by the member states. I am still examining the comments that I received on the FACC report on enzymes.

Farm Chemicals

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what present inquiry is being undertaken by his Department as to the effects of the use of farm chemicals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: A very wide variety of chemicals are used on farms, including disinfectants, fertilisers, sillage additives, pesticides and veterinary medicines. There is no general inquiry into the effects of the use of these materials being conducted by my Department.

Sea Defence Works

Mr. Rathbone asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for 1986-87 all major sea defence works and the Government's contribution to each under the Land Drainage Act 1976.

Mr. Gummer: Under the Land Drainage Act 1976 it is for drainage authorities to decide which sea defence schemes they choose to undertake and submit to the Department for approval in order to obtain grant-aid. We cannot predict when water authorities or local authorities will start approved schemes or the likely progress of work. The following schemes, however, have already commenced and are expected to continue in 1986-87. Grant rates for water authorities for 1986-87 have yet to be confirmed.

Mr. Rathbone asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for 1986-87 all major works combating coastal erosion and the Government's contribution to each under the Coast Protection Act 1949.

Mr. Gummer: Under the Coast Protection Act 1949 it is for local authorities to decide which coast protection schemes they wish to submit for approval. We cannot know precisely when local authorities will start approved schemes or the likely progress of the work. The following schemes have, however, already begun and are expected to continue in 1986-87.

Animal Hunts

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what deputations he has received from bodies representing those who hunt animals with regard to hunting on agricultural land or land belonging to the Forestry Commission in England in the two years preceding 10 March.

Mr. Jopling: My right hon. Friend met the chairman of the Masters of Foxhounds Association in November 1984 to discuss hunting on Forestry Commission land. He has not received any other deputations.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what changes he has urged upon the Forestry Commission within the two years preceding 10 March with regard to the rules governing the hunting of animals on its land in England.

Mr. Jopling: We have not asked the Forestry Commission to make any changes to its rules governing hunting over the land it manages in England.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all correspondence passing between his Department on his behalf and the Forestry Commission regarding the activities of hunts upon property of the Forestry Commission in the two years immediately preceding 10 March.

Mr. Jopling: There has been no such correspondence; the Forestry Commission answers directly to me for its activities in England.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what deputations he has received from animal welfare organisations in the two years prior to 10 March regarding hunting on agricultural land or Forestry Commission land in England.

Mr. Jopling: My right hon. Friend has not received any deputations from animal welfare organisations on this matter in the past two years.

Common Agricultural Policy (Budget)

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what would be the reduction in each case in the common agricultural policy budget for 1986 as a result of a 1 per cent. price reduction on the EEC Commission's price proposals for each of the following commodities: cereals, milk, beef and olive oil.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 13 March 1986, c. 573]: The following table shows the estimated reduction in EAGGF guarantee expenditure that would result in 1986 from a 1 per cent. price reduction additional to the EEC Commission's price proposals:

Mecu

	Cereals	Milk	Beef
Commission proposals	−392	+48	0
Additional 1 per cent. price reduction	−18	−49	−20
Total	−410	−1	−20

For olive oil, the saving from the Commission's price proposals and any additional 1 per cent. price reduction is likely to be negligible in 1986, as the marketing year for this product begins on 1 November.

ENERGY

Radioactive Material

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Energy if the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive has produced a preconstruction safety report as required by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate, to be judged against its safety assessment principles, for the construction of a Land 2 disposal facility.

Mr. Goodlad: The Waste Disposal Site Regulations, which will provide the framework for the licensing of sites including near-surface facilities, sometimes known as "land 2", will be laid before Parliament later this year. The preparation of a pre-construction safety report by NIREX will be the first stage of the licensing process, once a site has been chosen.

Energy Costs

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the annual expenditure at current prices by United Kingdom final energy users in each year from 1979.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The estimated annual expenditure on energy by final users in the United Kingdom, in the current prices for each year from 1979, is as follows:

	£ million
1979	21,295
1980	25,780
1981	29,830
1982	32,520
1983	34,980
1984	36,640

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy what level of expenditure in both cash and as a percentage of the total budget for energy research, development and demonstration, has been allocated to energy efficiency research in each financial year since 1979.

Mr. David Hunt: The information requested is given in the table.

Year	(a) Outturn expenditure on energy efficiency research and development and demonstration £000	(b) Column (a) as a percentage of total Department of Energy expenditure on energy research development and demonstration Per cent.
1979-80	1,023	0·6
1980-81	2,015	0·9
1981-82	4,106	1·6
1982-83	6,841	2·6
1983-84	6,997	2·9
1984-85	6,564	3·0

Mr Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many people are employed on the energy conservation demonstration project scheme at Harwell.

Mr. David Hunt: There are currently 61 staff employed on the energy efficiency demonstration scheme at Harwell.

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to the energy savings as a proportion of total energy consumption which have been made in each of the European Economic Community member states in each year from 1979.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The following table shows estimated percentage changes in the primary energy ratio (primary energy consumption per unit of gross domestic products) for individual countries betweeen 1979 and 1984. The figures are not temperature corrected. Changes in the ratio over short periods such as a year are not considered to provide a reliable indication of energy savings. Data for 1985 are not yet available.

Percentage change in energy ratio

Belgium	−13
Denmark	−20
Germany	−12

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 93

SESSION 1985-86

3rd March—14th March 1986

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There will, however, be headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one will find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc., under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speakers rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R=first reading, 2R=second reading, Money res=money resolution, Com=Committee stage, Rep=Report stage, 3R=third reading, amendt/amendts=amendment/amendments, *=matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
